ON THE ICONOGRAPHICAL ORIGIN OF LCAM-SRING, THE GOD OF WAR

JUAN ROGER RIVIERE

In the series of the Defenders of the Faith, in Sanskrit Dharmapala (द्धर्मपाल), in Tibetan Chos-skhyong (ཆོས་སྐྱོང), who execute the will of the tutelaries, one of them has a special figure for Tibetan theology: Lcam-pring (གླ་མ་སྤྲིང), the God of War. The representation of these Defenders is of the fiercest kind, drag-po (དྲན་པོ) or drags-rgal (གྲིམ་སྒྲིལ), and there was the problem of the origin of such iconographical conceptions. Some authors think that they are metamorphoses of the Hindu Kali Devi (काली देवी); others speak of a Chinese influence or a Tibetan origin, such representations coming possibly from ancient native gods or goddesses of the Bon (བོད) culture, for instance, The Red Tiger devil, I shall study here the iconography of the God of War; as in my particular collection of Thankas I have some representations of this dharmapala, they helped me in my work.

The usual representation which is in some of my Tibetan thankas is the following one:

He is red coloured and treads a horse with his right foot, and, with his left one, a naked man. With his right hand he brandishes a sparkling sword and between, his lips he mouths a human heart. In his left hand he carries a box and a spear with a red flag green cornered. He has a frontal eye. His armour is covered by a floating vestment with sleeves. At his left, accompanying him, is Srog-bdag (སྲོག་བདག) covered by an armour, sitting on a dark-grey wolf, in his right hand he carries a sword, and in his left one, a noose. At his right side appears Rig-lu-mo (རིག་ལུ་མོ), sitting on a light grey lion, with a knife in his right hand, and a gyur-te (གྱུར་ཐོད) in the left one. He is surrounded by red devils, the "knife holders" (gers-thogs) who cut the corpses which cover the battlefield, and who raven hearts, etc. They all carry a sword in their right hand.

It is a terrible Dharmapala. His head has the colourous aspect (ཀོ་བོ) of all those divinities and, just like his hands, it is red coloured. On his three-eyed forehead a skull's wreath is placed. From his back hangs a chain of severed heads. In another insta (འཐོ་མོ) he is covered by a golden armour, and with his right foot he treads a horse and with the left one a naked man. With his right hand he brandishes a sword, its pommel pur-ku ( ) shaped, and between his lips he mouths a human heart. His left arm carries a bow and a spear. He has a frontal eye, and on his head he bears a crown formed by five skulls. Hanging from his waist we can see the great garland of human hearts symbol of these terrible divinities. He is surrounded by ten emanations of himself. In the upper part there are three heads; in the middle, Conan-Kha pa ( ), sitting on a lotus in the attitude of meditation; his hands resting on his chest and holding the stems of two
He is accompanied by two of his disciples: Menyu grub ( ) at the right side, and Rgyal-dbang ( ) at the left one.

On another stupa, this god is distinct from his usual iconography: he is there on foot on a lotus, and no one is around him. With his right hand he brandishes a sword, he is devouring a human heart and carries a spear. The sun and the moon appear above. The painting is black, brown and yellow, red and white strokes. The divinity is surrounded by nemy clouds. Below, a fantastic background covered by bones.

It is well known that the Och-bom-pa has always a terrific appearance, bordered by flames, with sword, spear and whip. They are always of the fiercest fiendish kind. The Lha-ri ( ) or pal-bumring-po ( ) is the queen of the warring weapon, is one of them; she is surrounded by flames, riding on a white-faced mule, upon a saddle made out of the skin of her own son; she is clad in human skins and is eating a human body and drinking blood from a skull; often she has snakes around her. As it is known she is worshiped for seven days at the end of the twelfth month, and the offerings are placed in a bowl made out of a human skull. The identification Lha-ri with the Skudder (S1 22) or the Suddi (23) of the Hindu mythology is evident; in the case of Lha-ri, there is also a big influence of the prototype of the goddess Parvati (24).

According to Grünwedel and Ptolemy, Lom-spyi belongs to the group of the ruth-ched, the "Terrible Eighth" which are really the following nine gods: Rng-mey ( ); Lom-spyi ( ); Tshigs-khed ( ); Gyi-sn ( ); Kon-po ( ); Mgon ( ); Rnam-rje ( ); Grünwedel ( ); Rnam-rje ( ). Grünwedel has doubt about the origin of Lom-spyi, he is thinking of Kardzeya (6) or Skandak (7) the God of War of Hinduism, son of Siva (8) and Parvati (9). according to most of the Puranic texts. He notes the outstanding part played by the God of ‘War in the Taun’ dance. But I do not see in the Hindu iconography of Skanda anything which recalls the Tibetan God of War.

For my part, I think that almost every one of these terrible gods and goddesses, defenders of Buddhism, are coming from the same representations in Hinduism around the great Devi (Maa) in her destructive or transforming aspect: Camunda, (कमुंडा) for instance, is an emanation of Durga (दुर्गा) and the Markandeya Purana (मर्कण्डे) gives the description of the black goddess with a sword, a whip, a noose, a collar of skulls and with her eyes full of blood and fury. The Devi takes the forms of the Yogini (योगिनी), the witches and ogresses who accompany Durga and of the Dakini (दक्षिणी), the demons, eaters of human flesh and companions of Kali (काली): we have, in the Hindu demonology, the Graiti, witches who come into the body of new-borns and kill them, the Bhairavi (भैरवी), who assist Siva (शिव), and Durga, the Sakini (सकिनी) who help the black goddess. All these forms are the female side of the gods of war and terror, like Rudra (रुद्र), Bhairava (भैरव), Bhutesvara (भुटेश्वर), the ‘chief-of-the-phantoms’, with the serpents on his head and the color of skulls. All around these aspects of Siva-Rudra (शिव-रुद्र) there is a very rich iconography which has had certain consequences on Tibetan mythology. All the gods of the Drag po kind have their Hindu counterpart: Rta-mgri is Havagisra (हवागिस्र), Yul-ring ge’ed is Yameri (यामेरी), the Mitah-’gro-ma are the dakini, the demoniacal tutelaries. Surely, all these black Tibetan gods are coming from local and primitive deities but the theological conception and definition issue from Hinduism. The tantric rites from Bengal brought these deities and they were assimilated with local genii, many of them from the Don cult.

I think that our God of War, Liam-sring, belongs to that same class; all his characteristics are coming from the fiercest kind of Siva as Rudra (रुद्र) and Kali (काली); the frontal eye, the sword, the noose, the serpents, the skulls, the eyes full or rage. He is a destroyer, and, in this aspect, a Tibetan masculine copy of Kali, the transformer of the World. the “Black” who is symbol of the destruction of the Creation; her black colour represents the darkness of the Vajra of the Universe, as Kali is said “to be clad with Space”, digambari (दिगम्बरी). She is the Great Mother who unceasingly creates forms but life continues only by Death and Renewal. Kali is the goddess of the Infinite Power who creates, transforms and dissolves the manifestation of the Universe. This aspect of transformation is represented by terrific instruments she carries, as the skulls, the blood, the serpent and the human corpses which surround her. Lcam-trug is also a destructive form of god; for this reason, he bears all the iconographical symbols of the Great Goddess, and his appearance is very close to some representations of the Hindu Black Goddess.
