THE SIMLA CONVENTION 1914:
A CHINESE PUZZLE

—NIRMAL C. SINHA

Among the important events of 1914 is the Simla Convention dated the 3rd July 1914. Three parties participated in a conference in Simla which ended in a tripartite agreement in draft form in March-April 1914. The three parties were India, China and Tibet.

After the draft agreement was ready, disputes between China and Tibet cropped up on two points: (1) the borders between China and Tibet and (2) the degree and nature of Chinese suzerainty over the Dalai Lama's government. These disputes were not solved in protracted consultations through the summer months of 1914. The British and the Tibetan delegates even then wanted to sign and ratify the draft agreed previously. The Chinese delegate, Ivan Chen, refused to sign and wanted further authorisation from Peking for signature. Ivan Chen waited out of the conference on 3rd July 1914 and proceeded to Calcutta en route to China. The British and Tibetan delegates signed the agreement and by further affirmative documents ratified the Convention as binding between the British Government in India and the Dalai Lama's Government in Tibet. Though the original draft for the agreement describing the three parties and delineating the rights and privileges of the three parties was retained, a declaration was added that China would not be entitled to any rights and privileges as a suzerain power in Tibet if she failed to sign or ratify the tripartite agreement.

The war of 1914 followed the Simla Convention in a matter of weeks and since Great Britain and China were on the same side as allies, neither Great Britain nor China made any positive declarations about China's rights and privileges outside the Simla Convention. China, however, informally questioned the validity of the Simla Convention, but never pressed the point for clarification. The same position was continued later by KMT China. During the Second World War, China would more often refer to the provisions of the Simla Convention and put pressure on the Allies, particularly, Britain and America, for recognition of China's suzerainty over Tibet. The question of borders between India and Tibet was not pressed so much. The British Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, was even persuaded to make a statement at the Pacific Council in Washington (May 1943) that "no one contests the Chinese suzerainty in Tibet". The British Foreign Office did not find this statement of the British P.M. to be wrong. But their subordinates in the Government of India, namely, the British officials in the Indian Civil Service, pointed out in secret communications to Anthony Eden, the British Foreign Minister, that China had no rights in Tibet unless China signed or otherwise assented the provisions about Sino-Tibetan relations in the Simla Convention.

In short, according to the British Officers in India, China could not have unqualified control over Tibet without any proper treaty or agreement between Tibet and China. This point of view could not be altogether rejected by the British Foreign Office and shortly afterwards (July 1943) Anthony Eden made a statement in answer to Chinese request for clarification, that the Chinese suzerainty in Tibet was conditional and in no case unlimited. At the end of the war, KMT China again raised this question and was given hearing in the Press outside China simply because China had been admitted into the club of the Four Great Powers which destroyed the three Axis Powers (Germany, Italy and Japan). In 1947 March, an Asian Relations Conference was held in New Delhi. There were delegations from different Asian countries which included the Modern republics of USSR and Tibet. In the conference hall was a big map of Asia which depicted Tibet as quite separate from China. The delegates from China protested against the presence of Tibetans delegates as a distinct group and the map of Asia as on the wall of the conference room. The map had to be removed though the Tibetan delegates continued. Ever since that event, the Chinese point of view about Tibet and about the Simla Convention has been circulating wider and wider and; when the People's Republic of China took over from the corrupt KMT regime, the former also took over all the antique claims of China about neighbouring countries. An important claim was based on the Chinese objection to the Simla Convention.

The Government of India did not care to assess the implications of Chinese claims, and, on the other hand, were too friendly towards China as a country which was the victim of Western imperialism as much as India. Thus in 1954 when India made a fresh treaty about trade and pilgrimage in Tibet, the Government of India, deliberately or carelessly, ignored the Simla Convention as "a relic of British imperialism". The Simla Convention and the documents attached to this agreement not only provided for trade and pilgrimage but also laid down the frontiers between India and Tibet in the east. This frontier is the so-called McMahon Line named after Sir Arthur Henry McMahon who was the chief delegate of the British government and was also the Chairman of the Tripartite Conference. Years later, when China disputed India's northern borders both in the east and in the west and when the Government of India referred to the eastern border as finally settled in the Simla Conference, China simply refused to acknowledge the validity or legality of the Simla Convention. China indirectly demanded to know why India had not referred to the Simla Convention or the McMahon Line in the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954.

II

The Simla Convention has been criticised on several grounds: (1) a tripartite agreement signed by two parties is invalid ab initio; (2) the Simla Convention was not signed by the Tibetan delegate; (3) the Simla Convention was merely initialled by the British and Tibetans delegates; and (4) Tibet had no right to sign the agreement when China had walked out.

We now reply to these arguments one by one.

(1) A tripartite agreement signed by two parties is not necessarily invalid ab initio. If there is nothing repugnant or contradictory in the text of a tripartite agreement, such agreement is fully enforceable between two subordinate parties so far as the liabilities and rights of the two parties are concerned. In the text of the Simla Convention the rights and liabilities of the two parties are very clearly stated; and the fact of third party having left the conference table could not and did not affect the position of the other two parties.

(2) The Simla Convention was signed by the Tibetan delegate even though the Chinese delegate advised the Tibetan delegate not to proceed further. The contention of the Tibetan delegate was that Tibet was represented at the Simla Conference on Tibet's own rights as a treaty-making state.
Tibet did not come to the conference as a subordinate and subsidiary authority under the new Republic of China. Therefore Tibet has the right to sign or refuse to sign an agreement on Tibet's own jurisdiction. The full signature of Lachen Shatra, the Tibetan delegate, is on the Simla Agreement for anybody's inspection even in 1974.

(3) It is true that the British plenipotentiary, Sir Arthur Henry McMahon, got his initials—A.H.M.—and desired that the Tibetan plenipotentiary should also put his initials in Tibetan. But since installing is not only difficult, but also impossible in Tibetan usage, the Tibetan plenipotentiary Lachen Shatra put his full signature describing his lineage even. After the signature, the British delegate put a note: initial and added at the bottom
"owing to it not being possible to write initials in Tibetan, the mark of the Lzechen at this place is his signature". This was to ensure that the two signatures should follow one uniform practice. Why the British wanted initials in place of signature is a quite different matter which is discussed later.
Here it is only noted that uniformity in the procedure of signature is very much obligatory in treaties and agreements between two or more countries.

Initials can very much be a good substitute for signature if followed by the seals of the country concerned. And, in fact, in a rule regarding interpretation of conventions much later, the League of Nations had given its considered judgement that initials could be as valid as full signatures in documents and

The British delegate was asking for the initials for the simple reason that the Chinese delegate was also asked to put his initials and to report to Peking for ratification. The Chinese delegate, Ivan Chen, was perhaps in the earlier stage inclined to accept this procedure, but later with the opening of the month of July, he could smell sulphur in the atmosphere and he very much anticipated that the British would be involved in a war with Germany before the month was out and, therefore, the British who happened to be present of the Chinese Republic, would not much bother about this. However, it became an absission later on with the Chinese authorities during the KMT period when they could not re-establish their sovereignty over Tibet. After World War II, pro-Chinese scholars in Britain took over this obsession with initials. A brilliant young scholar, Alastair Lamb, straightway rejected the authority of initials and conveniently ignoring the Geneva Convention on the Law of Treaties wrote a number of research papers on the Simla Convention and later on produced the famous book called The McMahon Line (1966). In this book as well as in his earlier papers, he consistently spelt "initialed" for "initialled". His first publications were from England and the spelling with single 'T' was undoubtedly most un-English. Lamb insisted on spelling like this to condemn the whole affair of initiating. When his famous McMahon Line in two volumes came out from North America there was just a notation for this American spelling. Meanwhile, much mischief has been caused to the claims of both India and Tibet by this argument about initials. The argument, unfortunately, was followed by many scholars in Indian universities.

(4) Thus we come to the only positive argument against the Simla Convention that Tibet had no right to sign independent of China or in the absence of China. In fact, this is the only argument which has been officially advanced by the People's Republic of China. It is a mark of Chinese diplomacy that in their non-official publications as also in the writings of sponsored scholars, the legality of the signature is not much discussed. There is a heavy and noisy propaganda in the non-official and semi-official writings that the treaty was not signed at all and that initials were not good enough to make them as strong as signatures. Some scholars, later on, had even made researches to prove that the Simla Convention being not properly signed and ratified between India and Tibet, was later on put into cold storage in the British Foreign Office and that a considerable section of opinion in the British Foreign Office considered the Simla Convention as dead and defunct. Interesting sidelights on this point can be found in Neville Maxwell's India's China War (1970).

In Chinese official statements, they admit that the Simla Convention was signed by the Tibetan delegate. But they reject the right of the Tibetan delegate to sign or ratify such an agreement without authority from Peking. The most important document is found in the Indian White Paper containing the Report of the officials of the Governments of India and the People's Republic of China on the Boundary Question (New Delhi, 1961) and in the Chinese Red Paper containing Report of the Officials of the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of India on the Boundary Question (Peking n.d.—1962).

"Premier Chou En-lai and Chinese officials do not deny the fact that the then Tibetan local representative signed the Simla Convention, but that they have always clearly pointed out at the same time that this is illegal and that Tibet has no right to conclude treaties separately." [Indian White Paper page CR 26: Chinese Red Paper, page 30.]

III

In the 1930s when the Government of India was revising and bringing up to date the official publication known as Aitchison's Treaties and Engagement, during the first stage of compilation the Simla Convention was dropped. This was because the British Government in India, under informal instructions of the Home Government, i.e., the British Foreign Office, was out to pamper China and fondly expected China to come to the conference table and sign the Simla Convention. The Republic of China was facing systematic invasions from Japan and it was in the interests of British Power in Asia to prop up the weak and corrupt Republic. The British were even willing to let China come back to Tibet as the suzerain Power and this could be possible only if China signed the Simla Convention.

While waiting for China's ratification or signature was no doubt good diplomacy, the fact of the Simla Convention between India and Tibet could not be ignored without serious consequences. The two signatory parties, India and Tibet, were carrying on trade and pilgrimage under the terms of the Simla Convention, and if the agreement was defunct, all transactions between India and Tibet would be illegal. Besides, one solid gain out of the Simla conference, that is, the affirmation of the customary boundary between India and Tibet in the east, would be lost. Therefore, British officials in India, particularly, Oud Caroe and Hugh Richardson, advised strongly for the inclusion of the Simla Convention in the forthcoming edition of Altehorns Treaties. The relevant volume had, however, been pruned off. The print was called back and a fresh print made in which the Simla Convention and the connected documents were included. There was nothing secret in this matter. Besides British officials, Indian and Tibetan officials on either side knew about it.

In the 1960s the pro-Chinese scholars of Britain and India made much out of the fact of the cancelled print of Altehorns Treaties, relevant volume. In 1969-70, Neville Maxwell raised a hue and cry over this affair which, in the words of Maxwell and his Indian friends, came to be described variously as "mysterious", "controversial", "afterthought", "fraudulent", "fake", and even "spurious". Now the whole matter boils down to a tempest in a teapot when we remember that the People's Republic of China and that Prime Minister Chou En-lai, have officially, on several occasions, admitted not only the existence of the Simla Convention as a signed document but also that Tibet had signed the agreement. It is therefore, not necessary to argue further whether the Simla Convention was a "fraud", "fake" or "spurious".

When the new generation of British scholars, like Alastair Lamb and Neville Maxwell, speak about the imperialistic designs of British officials in Asia and name Olaf Caroe and Hugh Richardson as imperialists there is a touch of the British sense of justice in the researches of the new generation. The Indian scholars are easily misled to accept the researches and conclusions of Lamb or Maxwell as innocent protests. The Indian scholars are yet to realize that Lamb and Maxwell are also Bretons and they may also have their interests in creating further discord and disagreement between India and China.

The truth of the matter lies in the uncomfortable fact of Tibet's claims to independence. If Tibet could sign an agreement in July 1914, Tibet was no doubt an independent country on that day. The scholars as well as diplomats of the People's Republic of China very much want the agreement to be accepted as a document of history but a document with "illegal signature". It serves the cause of China as the suzerain Power if China's contention is admitted by India that Tibet signed the document without any authority or jurisdiction. Thus even if Sir Olaf Caroe from his retirement or the late Sir Arthur Henry McMahon from his grave would come to New Delhi or Peking and say that the Simla Convention was not a fact, the People's Republic of China will call it a fact of history. In short, if the Simla Convention is legal, it serves the cause of Tibet; if the Simla Convention is illegal, it serves the cause of China.

From this one can easily notice the great diplomatic blunder on the part of the Government of India, when in 1954 India surrendered all special rights and privileges in the Tibet Region of China without referring to the document under which the Republic of India was enjoying these special rights and privileges as the successor to the British empire in India. Indian scholars tooting the line of Lamb and Maxwell condone the crime by denying the historic fact of the Simla Convention. And our eastern Himalayan frontiers called the McMahon Line are disputed by the new generation of British scholars professing to atomize for the seas of their forbears; a profession which no doubt deeply influences the fellow travellers all over the former British Empire in the East.
This article (supra pp.5-9), written in 1974, was within prescribed space limits. Some facts about the Simla Convention 1914 as a lawful instrument of international relations may be added now for ready reference of the general reader.

The Convention along with the Trade Regulations, both signed on 5 July 1914 at Simla, entitled British Government of India to extra-territorial rights in Tibet. These rights may be summed as three: (i) armed escorts (of British or British Indian troops) for the British Trade Agent in Tibet, (ii) the telegraph lines from Indian frontier to the Trade Agent’s offices as also the carriage and transport of posts to and from the Indian frontier owned and operated by the Government of India, and (iii) all cases regarding property or person between British subjects within jurisdiction of British Trade Agents as also some cases involving British subjects as defendants.

These British rights in Tibet continued till 1947 when such rights passed to the succeeding state of independent India, Dominion of India and later Republic of India exercised these rights till 1954.

In the notes exchanged on 29 April 1954 at Peking immediately after the India-China Agreement was signed it was "agreed between the two governments as follows:"

"(1) The Government of India will be pleased to withdraw completely within six (6) months from the date of exchange of the present note the military escorts now stationed at Yatung and Gyantse in Tibet Region of China. The Government of China will render facilities and assistance in such withdrawal."

"(2) The Government of India will be pleased to hand over to the Government of China at a reasonable price the postal, telegraph and public telephone services together with their equipment operated by the Government of India in Tibet Region of China. The concrete measures in this regard will be decided upon through further negotiations between the Indian Embassy in China and the Foreign Ministry of China, which shall start immediately after the exchange of the present notes."

"(3) The Government of India will be pleased to hand over to the Government of China at a reasonable price the twelve (12) rest houses of the Government of India in Tibet region of China. The concrete measures in this regard will be decided upon through further negotiations between the Indian Embassy in China and the Foreign Ministry of China, which shall start immediately after the exchange of the present notes. The Government of China agrees that they shall continue as rest houses."
"(6) The Trade Agents of both parties may, in accordance with the laws and regulations of the local governments, have access to their nationals involved in civil or criminal cases."

"(15) Disputes between traders of both countries over debts and claims shall be handled in accordance with local laws and regulations."

Paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (6) and (15) of the Notes Exchanged on 29 April 1954 testify that India was in full enjoyment of extraterritorial rights in Tibet on the date. These rights were detailed and guaranteed in the Simla Convention 1914 (and the Trade Regulations dated same, i.e. Simla 3 July 1914).

In the following three decades, China on several occasions questioned the Convention's validity just to revive China's claims to suzerainty over Tibet. Britain was willing to admit Chinese suzerainty over Tibet if China would accept the Simla Convention provision relating to Sino-Tibetan border as well as Tibetan Government's autonomy within Tibet. China would not agree and the Convention continued as valid between Britain and Tibet.

Though Britain was all out to pamper China as one of the Four Allies in the war against the Axis Powers, Tibet was in no mood to compromise its independence to suit China's war efforts. The advisers around the minor Dalai Lama (born 1935; consecrated 1940) refused to declare Tibet belligerent on the side of Britain and China. Tibet pursued strict neutrality not unlike Ireland. Even overland supply lines, from Anglo-American bases in India to Chinese bases in the mainland, were not permitted because Tibet was not a Chinese territory.

On 11 January 1943 at Chungking, Britain signed away all the extra-territorial rights in Tibet because Tibet was not a Chinese treaty. Far from being an oversight, the exclusion of British right in Tibet from the purview of Chungking Treaty was deliberate and calculated. To placate China, Britain could have mentioned Tibet as a region of China and yet excluded British rights in Tibet from the operative clauses of the treaty. This was not done for the simple reason that Tibet's independence was definite and durable.

The Simla Convention, guaranteeing India's extra-territorial rights in Tibet and confirming the frontier between India and Tibet in the east, was thus operative till the end of April 1954. The frontier so confirmed was the traditional frontier along the crest of the Himalayas from the northern corner of Bhutan to the Lhasa pass in the north of Burma. It came to be called the Mahon Line, because Arthur Henry Mc Mahon, the British Plenipotentiary and chairman of the Simla Conference, had marked on the map the finally accepted line with his pencil.
Finalization of this line was made on 24/25 March 1914 by the two concerned parties, British Plenipotentiary (A.H. MacMahon) and Tibetan Plenipotentiary (Lochen Shatra). On being informed later Chinese Plenipotentiary (Ivan Chen) did not express any disagreement. All Chinese disagreements and their eventual withdrawal from the Simla Conference cleared the Sino-Tibetan borders and Tibetan autonomy.

The map depicting MacMahon Line with the signatures of all Plenipotentiaries is found in An Atlas of the Northern Frontier of India (Government of India 1960). The Chinese concepts of “huzurenty” or “tribute” will be found in FAIIHUAO (1963) and TENG (1957) on the Ching Tributary System in Harvard Oriental Journal 1951 and SINHA (N.C.) in Asian Law and Usage in European Expression in Man in India 1966.

BUDDHA DĪPAṆKARA
TWENTYFOURTH PREDECESSOR
OF GAUTAMA

—B. GHOSH

Buddhism in all its forms goes back to the life and teachings of Gautama Buddha. While the austerity practised by Buddha till he attained enlightenment appeal to the Pali or Southern school called Hinayana, his life of service and compassion for 45 years after the attainment of Enlightenment is the authority to Sanskrit or Northern school called Mahayana (S. Radhakrishnan, preface, Pali Tripitaka, Ed. Kashyap).

The Buddhavagisa, in Khuddakankilaya or "the collection of smaller pieces", gives an account of the Previous Buddhas with whom Buddhistic Gautama had some contact and who had made prediction that Buddhistic Gautama would attain perfect Enlightenment. It is interesting to note that the Jain mythology also gives a similar account of the previous Tirthankaras, it is all the more interesting that even the number of the previous Buddhas and that of Tirthankaras are not very different (Kashyap, Khud, Nip. vol. VIII). Dīpankara Buddha is remembered specially and held in high esteem for the reason that according to legend it was while Dīpankara was the Buddha that Gautama Buddha was an ascetic named Sunecha and had made his vow to become Buddha.

Buddhavagisa (edited by Morris in P.T.S 1882), contains poetical legend of the 24 Buddhas who are supposed to have preceded Gautama Buddha in the last twelve ages of the world (Kalpa). After the introductory, one chapter is dedicated to each of the 24 Buddhas. It is related in case of each single Buddha, how he sets the Wheel of Law in motion and how — with but striking differences — the principal events in the life of Gautama Buddha were enacted in the life of each of the former Buddhas. It is Gautama Buddha himself who narrates the life story and speaking in first person, he recounts who he himself was in each of the preceding lives, how he worshipped the Buddha, and how his own Buddhahood had been foretold by the Buddha of that time. "The only part which is a little more imaginative and poetical is the second chapter" (Winternitz: A History of Indian Literature, vol. III Buddhist literature p 161), which deals with Dīpankara, the first Buddha. Maurice Winternitz noted here that usually the Budighe was Sakka (skt. Sakra), the king of the Gods, another time a lion, the king of beasts, twice a king of the Negas, once a yakṣa and several times an ascetic.
We quote an account of Dipaṅkara Buddha as briefly narrated by Winternitz.

"Gautama Buddha was at that time a rich Brahman named Sumedha, and he relates in verse (7-27) which are reminiscent of Theragathas, how one day he felt disgusted with the world, how he cast off the wretched body, as though it were ditt, and withdrew to a hermitage in the Himalaya. This was precisely his campaign of conquest throughout the world, and men and gods worshipped him. Sumedha, the hermit, comes too, and at a marshy spot loosens his plaited hair, spreads it out on the dirty ground, with his hangman's garment and his cloak of skins, and lies face downwards. This scene has often been depicted on Buddhist monuments, probably it already appeared on the stupa of Bharhatu) inspired with the wish that the exalted Buddha Dipaṅkara, with his host of disciples, may step over him without having their feet soiled by mud. Prostrating on the ground, he resolves to become a Buddha one day and bring salvation to the world. Sāṃkara approaches and prophesies the future greatness of Sumedha. The inhabitants of the ten thousand worlds make a joyful noise and signs and miracles happen, as it always the case when future Buddha is foretold. But Sumedha determines to realise in himself all the ten perfections (Pratītyas), in order to fulfill the preliminary conditions of Buddhahood." (A History of Indian literature, vol. 8 pp. 160-161).

DIPAṄKARA LEGENDS

Buddhavagisa describes the splendid of the first Tathagata Buddha that is, Dipaṅkara in magnificent terms. The verses (15,27,28 and 31) are reproduced at end of the article. We give in short the details thus: Dipaṅkara was 80 cubit tall, shining like big tree of lamps, he was always attended by 84,000 Arhats, he lived for 100,000 years and the 56 prātis in which his remains were enshrined was 36 yojanas high.

Gautama Buddha, it is said, came down to this world from the Tusita heaven where he was the presiding god. He had reached that heavenly state by acquiring immeasurable merits in his several previous existences. There are two stories, one in the Mahāvastu: Dipaṅkaravastu and the other in the Nīlakaṇṭha-Kathā, about his past life, in which he was assured by Dipaṅkara Buddha that he would ultimately attain Buddha, the Supreme knowledge. The two stories are as follows:

1. Mahāvastu: Gautama Buddha was once born as a Brāhmaṇa's son known as Megha Mānava. He completed his Brāhmaṇic education and came down to the plains of the Himalaya to procure the fee to be given to his Guru on the termination of his studies. He collected 500 coins (Purūtraś). He then went to see the capital Dipavali and found the city in a festive mood. On enquiring he learnt from a beautiful young maiden with seven lotuses in her hand that the city had been decorated to welcome Buddha Dipaṅkara. He thereupon offered to purchase her five lotuses by paying 300 purānas. He was told that he could have them if only he would promise to take her as his wife. After protesting a little, he agreed to her proposal on her assurance that she would not stand in the way of his spiritual career. On seeing the glorious appearance of Buddha Dipankara, he became deeply reverential and attained the notion of non-duality (advaya atman). He became a devotee of buddha by seeing the miraculous powers and expressed his devotion and admiration by wiping the lotus-like feet of Buddha by his long hair, and while doing so he developed the aspiration to attain Buddhahood.

II

Nālakāśī: Gautama Buddha was once born as Sumedha Brahmāna a Amarapati in a very rich Brahman family of pure lineage. He lost his parents at an early age. He learnt the Brahmanic sciences and was sick of the wealth left by his parents. He gave them away in charity and became an ascetic seeking immortality (atmanam jāhanti) a state free from origin and decay, pleasure and pain, disease or suffering. He realised that as everything in this world has two aspects, positive and negative as an antithesis to origin (birth), there must be something unoriginate, and he was to realise it. He went to the Himalayas and took up an abode at Dhammakāla mountain living only on fruits falling from trees. He soon attained perfection in meditation and six higher powers (abhisambuja: The six abhijñās are: bodh (enlightened power), dīrghasastra-mahā (heavenly eyes), paricitipāśāna (father's thoughtreading), phubbanvāsāśāna (knowledge of previous births), dīrgha-kākhu (hearing eyes) and dīrgharāma-kākhu (knowledge of extinction of one's own impieties) occasionally he paid visits to the villages for salt and verjose and one day came down to Rāmaka, a city in a paccatadāsāvaya (border country).

At that time Buddha Dipankara reached the city and stopped at Sudassānamahāvāra. Sudassā tapasa found all the people busy in making the place neat and tidy for welcoming Dipankara Buddha and so he also came forward to take a share in the work. He was charmed by the glory of Buddha's appearance and wanted to lay down his life for him. Last Dipankara Buddha should soil his feet in a miry place he lay flat on it like a bridge made of jewels (Mariphalakasetu) in order that he and his disciples, who were all arhatās (perfects) might tread on his body. While so lying, he wished that he would not merely attain his own salvation by putting an end to the impieties which he could have easily done, but he would also become a Buddha in order that he might rescue endless beings from the stream of existence. At that time, Dipankara standing just before his head, made the forecast that the great Jayā ascetic would become a Buddha after numberless aeons, and related in detail where he would be born, how he would attain the supreme knowledge (buddhi), and who would become his chief disciple. The prediction was confirmed by many miraculous events including an earthquake, and there was no doubt left that Sumedha was a "Buddha-Dipankaru".
Since his existence as Megha Māṇava or Sumedha Bhāṁarṣa, the Bodhisattva (i.e. one destined to be the Buddha) was born several times to acquire the ten supreme perfections (pāramitās) preparatory to Buddhahood, which he attained in his last mortal existence as prince Siddhārtha, his penultimate existence, he was born as the lord of the gods the Tusāvī planets. (N. Dutt: Early Monastic Buddhism, pp. 77–19).

We find in Nīlākaṇṭha Kāthā, Lalitavistara and Mahāvastu the Abhiniksramana Sūtra (extant in Chinese only) Buddha legends giving the story of Buddha down to the events after enlightenment, but not records of the previous lives from the oldest time cycles when at the feet of Dīpākara, the Bodhisattva first made the resolution to attain Buddhahood.

Six previous Buddhas are mentioned in the Suttas. Longer lists vary, though all agree on Dīpākara as the leading previous Buddha.

Sir Charles Elliot observing on actual historicity of some human Buddhas says "In the older books of the Pāṭhakas six Buddhas are mentioned on proceeding Gautama (Dīkṣ. Nik. 14/Mahāvastu/Buddhāsattas here, 499: Sam. Nik. XII 6–10) namely viṇśatī, sikhī, viṇāṭī, viṇāṭī, viṇāṭī, viṇāṭī, viṇāṭī who have been preserved Link Lama’s. The last three at least may have some historical character. The Chinese pilgrim Fa-hien, who visited India from 405–413 A.D., saw their reputed birth places and says that there still existed followers of Devadatta (apparently in Khotan) who recognised these three Buddhas but not Gotama. Asura erected a monument in honour of Kṣitigarbha in Nepal with a dedicatory inscription which has been preserved. In the Majjāna, Nāgara (Mā. Nik. 50 Māratajaras) we find a story about Kukusanda and his disciples and Gotama once gave (Dīk. Nik. 16) an extended account of viṇāṭī whose teaching and career are represented as almost identical with his own _________." (Hindulism and Buddhism, vol. I, p. 342.)

The Carlyle takes in the sense of metrical narration, put in the mouth of the Buddha himself, giving accounts of his previous lives, taken from the Jātaka, showing how he has fulfilled the ten pāramitās for the attainment of Buddhahood.

Extension of the legend went on in other schools also in different ways. The Lalitavistara has a list of fifty four Buddhas and Mahāvastu more than hundred, but both include Dīpākara. We conclude our account with the comments of E.L. Thomas on the topic, "In the doctrine of nature of Buddha we can see the development of new conceptions, the most important of these, are the belief in previous Buddhas, the theory of a great man (Mahāpurua), who is to become either a universal ruler as a Buddha, the thirty two bodily marks of such a being and theory of Bodhisattva."
"It has been held that the belief in previous Buddha points to the actual existence of at least some of them. We know that Akoka established a temple of Kōgūmā, the fifth of six preceding Buddhahs, and the Chinese pilgrims visited the site of the last three of them. This only proves that the legend concerning them, then existed, but it does not prove these Buddhahs to be historical, and more than the foot print of Buddha on Adam's Peak prove that he visited Ceylon" (The Life of Buddha, p. 218).

Whether the Preceeding Buddhahs were real or legendary, the tradition about Dipaśakara as the Bodhisattva of the past was as strong in the Theravada as in the Mahayana School. The enumeration of 26 predecessors of Gautama Śakyamuni found in Buddhavamsa begins with Dipaśakara Bodhisattva. This lineage may be presented as follows: 1 Dipaśakara Buddha, 2 Kōgūmā Buddha, 3 Mani-gala Buddha, 4 Sumana Buddha, 5 Revata Buddha, 6 Sādhita Buddha, 7 Anamadakā Buddha, 7 Paduma Bodhisattva, 8 Nībodha Buddha, 9 Padumutara Buddha, 11 Sumedha Buddha, 12 Svātī Buddha, 13 Priyasad Buddha, 14 Arthaḍasād Buddha, 15 Dhammadasi Buddha, 16 Vipasi Buddha, 17. Sākhi Buddha, 18. Vessabhū Buddha, 20. Purusadvāda Buddha, 21. Kaśyapa Buddha, 22. Kōgū-gamana Buddha, 24. Kaśyapa Buddha.

In Sanskrit sources, list of previous Buddhhas differs very widely in enumeration and nomenclature. The predecessors count anything from 6 (six) to more than 100 (hundred). In all these list, Dipaśakara features as the foremost, even though not as the first as in Buddhavamsa. The importance of Dipaśakara lies in the fact that he (Dipaśakara) had blessed the future Buddha (Gautama Śakyamuni) and prophesied Gautama's realization of full enlightenment in a future life. The story of the meeting presented here is gathered from the accounts of Sūtraśūtraśāstra, Bodhisattvsvadāna-Kapalasūtra, and Kaśyapa-

In Sūtraśūtraśāstra, when Lord was at Oghdiśāgiri near the town Rājagriha, Ananda asked the Lord for an account of the great Tathāgata, who had in former ages, acquired the most perfect Body. The Lord in reply said, one of the earliest was Dipaśakara (R.L., Mitra: The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal, p. 231).

We give below brief legendary account of Dipaśakara Dharmaruci/Tīrthāgīla Avadāna from Bodhisattvsvadāna-Kapalasūtra of Kṣemendra (11th century A.D.). We find the Dipaśakara legend in a somewhat different form. We extract the relevant portion of the story: In another Kalpa two Brahmā brothers, Mati and Sumati appeared as the sacrifices of Viśava, king of Benares. They obtained whatever they sought from the king. The king's daughter, named Sundari became enamoured of Sumati but her suit was rejected by the saint Brāhmaṇa. Thus deeply mortified, she resigned the world, and became Brāhmaṇa. Sumati dreamt a strange dream, for the explanation of which he, inspired by the advice of the Paracchani, went to Lord Dīpaśrava, who lived at Dīpaśrava. There he met Sundari and asked flowers from her. When offering him the flowers Sundari prayed that he be her husband in the next existence. Sumati fell prostrate before the lord with his clothed hair scattered all over the ground. Lord Dīpaśrava told them then, explaining you shall become a great Buddha, Śakyamuni by name, Māli, who was standing by, felt his Brāhmaṇa pride scandalised by the unbridled conduct of his brother but Sumati induced him to reverence the Lord. I am that Sumati, Yaśodharā is Sundarī and Māli is Dhammarāja", (R.L. Misra, The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal, p. 71).

In kaporā-aśvabhama, the following story said to have been told by (one of the former human Buddhas) Vipassī, long before the Lord's advent. Here we find episode of Money named Dīpaśrava and Dīpaśrava. Dīpaśrava promised him transformation into man and gave him instruction in the philosophy of Buddha, the monkey was born a merchant's son named Dhammarāj. Dīpaśrava granted him born, saying "for good conduct, you are to become Sarvabhūta, the king of Dīpaśrava" (Rud. p. 98).
SIMLA CONVENTION 1914

In 1950 autumn People's Republic of China invaded Tibet and completed its occupation by 1951 spring. Since Tibet was not then a region of China, this occupation was an annexation of a small country by a big country. To legalize this conquest China called the Tibetan leaders to Peking and made them surrender Tibet's independence. The treaty signed at Peking on 23rd May 1951 was called "Agreement on Measures for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet", Tibetans ever since have called this "Agreement for Violent Destruction of Tibet's Identity and Independence".

Tibetans point out the bilateral treaty with British signed at Simla on 3rd July 1914 as sufficient proof of Tibet's independence. People's Republic of China was in the beginning silent and broke their silence sometime after India agreed to accept Tibet as Tibet Region of China (Sino-Indian Agreement, Peking 29 April 1954). Chinese leaders sometimes challenged the signatures on Simla Convention, sometimes denied Tibet's right to sign such agreement. This "heads I win or tails you lose" was Chinese propaganda till a few years ago. The current propaganda is that Tibet was never independent in the past -- and not in 1914.

In summer this year Beijing has come out with enormous and flamboyant handouts to challenge Tibet's independence. To answer this we could locate a brief and precise statement by an Indian scholar published in 1974. The facts and arguments in this article of 1974 stand equally good in 1987. The author, N.C. Sinha, has kindly added some notes for the general readers.

We acknowledge with compliments that the article was first published in Presidency College Magazine (Calcutta 1974)

BODHIPATHA PRADIPA

Bodhipatha Pradipa composed by Sirjana Dipankara Atsa during his residence in Tholing Gompa (Western Tibet) and available in authorised and authenticated Tibetan translation by the author himself is rightly celebrated in Tibet and Mongolia as the most important book of the great saint scholar.
As an exposition of the central philosophy of the Dharma Bodhisatvayana -- it is prized for its presentation of deepest thoughts.
The work is reproduced in this issue of the Bulletin and shortly a detailed critique (in English) will be published.

We now refer to a controversy raised by a lama that Atika did not preach Kalachakra Tantra as recorded in Kadampa and Gelugpa works (vide Bulletin 1985 Nos. 1 & 2 and 1986 No. 2).

A Tibetan scholar from Dharamsala has drawn our notice to verse 63 of Bodhipatha Pradipa where the Kalachakra work Ad-buddha-mahta-tantra is cited with great respect. This work will be reproduced from KANJUR in our next issue, with full comments. We thank the Dharamsala scholar for drawing our notice to this reference.
