A classless society. And we all fall down.

An assorted Nepali identity by the International Coalition to Stop the Use of Child Soldiers showed that a third of Maoist militants are underage children, many of them school drop-outs. The Maoist leadership, from the very beginning of the “people’s war”, has been trying to recruit new members from all walks of life, including students. A deeply felt need for reform is recognized in Nepal's society, but the challenge lies in translating these sentiments into effective policies. A recent letter to the editor, signed by various citizens, highlights the urgency of addressing the root causes of nepotism in the educational system. The letter argues that reform is not just about changing the system, but also about ensuring that the changes are sustainable and equitable. The writers call for a comprehensive review of the current educational framework, focusing on issues such as access, quality, and accountability.

The letter also emphasizes the importance of involving the stakeholders in the reform process, particularly the students and teachers, who are the direct beneficiaries and casualties of the system. It suggests the formation of a committee comprising representatives from various sectors, including government officials, educators, and civil society groups, to oversee the implementation of the reforms. This approach is seen as crucial in ensuring that the reforms are not only feasible but also sustainable over the long term.

The letter further advocates for a holistic approach to education, which addresses not only the academic aspects but also the social and emotional development of students. This approach, it argues, can help in creating a more inclusive and equitable learning environment, where every child has the opportunity to reach their full potential.

In conclusion, the letter underscores the need for a genuine and sustained commitment to education reform in Nepal. It calls for a collective effort from all stakeholders to ensure that the reforms are not just implemented but also sustained and effective. The letter ends with a call to action, urging all concerned parties to contribute towards a brighter future for Nepal's educational sector.

New world disorder

The social contract that lies at the heart of democracy has been fatally weakened. Society can no longer count on the state to provide public goods and resolve disputes through procedures it has created. It is constantly running away from its responsibilities to the people it has conscripted through taxes. Society has been left to solve problems that it has created — and the state — for its part — has run away from its responsibilities to the society that it has conscripted.

Society is now a series of closed groups, each of which imposes its will on the others. Democracy has been replaced by a series of closed groups, each of which imposes its will on the others. Society is now a series of closed groups, each of which imposes its will on the others.

People’s peace
The imperatives are pressing.

The Maoist’s money is being used to upgrade police and Army stations and the already considerable number of police checkpoints. The income is spent on improving the army’s capacity to maintain law and order or forestall the Maoists. The main source of recruitment for the police is the Nepalese Army. The size of the Nepalese Army has already increased to 100,000 personnel. The army’s recruitment is tightly controlled by the Maoists. In the Maoist controlled areas, the police have virtually no jurisdiction to maintain law and order.

The government of Nepal is not taking any effective measures to stop the Maoists. The Maoists themselves are aware of the ill effects of their activities, and they have come up with some measures to improve the situation. They have also started to recruit more trained police personnel and to improve the overall security situation in the country.

Building bridges

When the British-era road bridges were built in Nepal, in the 1880s, they would span villages to which people wanted to get to a school, a hospital, or to a market. The sound of the Nepali phrase, “We want a bridge,” has changed a lot since then. But even today, a bridge is still high on the priority list of many Nepalis. Nepal remains the only country in the world that is not connected by a bridge. In 2019, the government declared a national goal of building 3,000 bridges across the country within five years. The aim is to connect all districts and villages, which, with its left hand and in such a situation, would considerably affect so many people.

The cost must not be the only consideration. It is important to consider accessibility. A bridge may open valleys and barriers across the world, but its cost must be such that it can be built in a way that connects people from different cultures and backgrounds.

According to the 1999 Kathmandu conference, there are differences. Today, rudimentary materials like reed have been replaced by modern materials like steel. Although the technology has evolved, the way communities want a bridge has also changed. They are now looking for bridges that are safe, reliable, and affordable.

In the Poon Holy Bridge Area, the government has started construction work on a bridge. The project aims to build a bridge that will be a symbol of the community’s resolve to overcome the challenges faced by the local community. The bridge will be built in the traditional style, using local materials, and will connect the villages to the main road.

Twisting the truth

Within a single week, 150,000 Nepalis expressed their support for policies adopted by the CPN-UML, according to the party's statistics. The figure was higher than the party's estimate of 120,000, which it claimed in mid-November because it could not mobilize people protesting in 11 districts where the police had declared a "strike" the night before.

The largest mass movement was organized in Butwal where, according to official government tallies, nearly 50,000 people took part. More than 25,000 people turned up for the meetings in Kathmandu.

I would have been happy if I had died of my disease. Dr. Devkota can you give me the gift of Earlier, when I predicted the deterioration of the political leaders would begin, my friends feared that I was being too pessimistic. They expected a degree of decency from the government. Unfortunately I was right. The state owned news agency, RSS, referred to an incident, that is the image of the prime minister, Bhuwaneshwar Mahato, who had shot and killed anowing the body of a woman. The RSS news agency, which is under state control, now only reports and reprints the RSS news agency.

It could have been a big loss if RSS had written that a woman who is a minister in the state government, his government had fabricated the charges and arrested him. The RSS prime minister was not even the victim of an armed attack. It could have been a big loss if RSS had written that a woman who is a minister in the state government, and he had been arrested by the RSS prime minister.

Regarding the allegation of former Prime Minister Prachanda it is another matter. 40 percent of the seats in the state government is reserved for women. This is another matter. It is another matter because Prachanda is a member of the RSS prime minister and a brother of one of the RSS prime minister's mother.

I stand by these three series of attempts to define the multiparty system. The problem is with me not with the RSS prime minister, but in the RSS prime minister's methods. It is not new. It is not new. It is not new.

Quoting the Week

"We are preparing for the battle of Mahabharata. We are waiting an urge. Once the distant battle Trump will be fought and we will be the ultimate winner."

-Ravindra Gautam, standing committee member of the CPN-UML, addressing a mass programme in Kathmandu.

Chapter 8, December

It's time now to prepare for the big fight against the RSS prime minister. We are waiting an urge. Once the distant battle Trump will be fought and we will be the ultimate winner.

The RSS prime minister is a classic example of a political leader who does not know how to govern a country.

Kingdom of Boredom

A

By Kundan Dixit

The Kingdom of Boredom is a place where time seems to stand still. It's a land where the sun never sets, and there is never a moment of rest. The only sound is the rustling of leaves in the quiet air. It's a place where the sky is always clear, and the stars twinkle brightly. But the people there are all alone, with no company to keep them company.

Life in the Kingdom of Boredom is simple. People wake up when they want to and go to bed when they want to. They spend their days by staring at the sky or talking to themselves. They never have to work or learn new things.

Despite the beauty of the Kingdom of Boredom, it's a place that few people want to live in. The days are long, and the nights are endless. It's a place where there is no joy, no laughter, and no love.

If you ever find yourself feeling bored, remember that there's a place called the Kingdom of Boredom, where time stands still, and life is nothing but a monotonous routine.
