The political deadlock has delayed the budget, but a standby Appropriations Bill will be passed next week. The formation of a Maoist-led government will take at least another two weeks, and no one knows what its priorities are. The budget is usually passed by 16 July, usually after debate on policies and programs.

The bill will allow for one-third of the current budget of Rs 163 billion to be released so that the state can function until a government is formed. However, the bill has no targets for revenue and no new tax decisions.

The Maoists have not taken part in the budget planning exercise, but have bluntly warned officials not to make decisions without their nod. The NC and the UML also haven’t consulted with the Maoists on the bill. “This is a shame for the country that they can’t work together,” says economist Bishwambhar Pyakurel.

The Maoists are waiting to push through populist spending like pensions for women and debt-forgiveness to farmers. “They are being over-optimistic on the revenue side,” said one official. “It’s hard to see how all this is going to be paid for.”

The Maoists also want development expenditure disbursed through the YCL and government-run fair price shops. These ideas are not popular with Nepal’s donors who have warned of aid cuts.

As it happens, every time there is a messy political transition in this country it is Nepal's hard-fought achievements in forest conservation that suffer a serious setback. The run-up to the Panchayat referendum of 1980 witnessed a massive decimation of Tari forests. There was then no effective management of the forest. The current anarchy is caused by the prolonged political deadlock in Kathmandu. This state of statelessness is having a devastating impact on our national parks and the plunder of forests that communities have invested decades to protect. One of the things we in Nepal can be justifiably proud of is the success of our community forests. Nurtured by local communities, they have not just protected the environment but also lifted many hundreds of villages in the midfright from poverty. In the plains downstream are prone to siltation of the fragile hills of the Chure, and with the forests stands at an alarming rate. These trees hold together the plains downstream are prone to siltation and flashfloods. By ensuring a peaceful political transition in the past two years, Nepal has been a model for the rest of the world. That achievement should not be tampered with by the short-sighted political bickering we have witnessed in Kathmandu these past three months. Similarly, let’s not allow government failure to wreck the community-based forest conservation success story.

When the Sadhu first arrived, he was treated with suspicion by the locals. They thought he was a dangerous and mysterious figure. But as time went on, the locals began to realize the importance of the Sadhu’s teachings. His message of nonviolence and love began to spread, and people began to listen. Before long, the Sadhu had become a respected leader in the region.

It was during this time that the Sadhu began to teach a simple, universal message. He taught people to live peacefully with each other and to respect all living things. He encouraged everyone to work together to create a better world for all. His teachings were based on the idea that everyone has a place in the world and that we all have a role to play in making it a better place.

Under the guidance of the Sadhu, the locals began to work together to improve their community. They built schools, hospitals, and other important facilities. They worked to improve the local economy and to create a better future for their children. The community became stronger and more united, and people felt a sense of pride in their accomplishments.

Despite the progress made, however, the Sadhu knew that there was still work to be done. He continued to teach and to inspire people to make their communities better. And as the years went by, the message of the Sadhu became known throughout the region. People listened to his teachings and were inspired to make a difference in their own lives and in the lives of others.

Today, the legacy of the Sadhu lives on. His message of peace and love is still being taught and practiced by people all over the world. His teachings remind us that we all have a role to play in making the world a better place, and that by working together, we can achieve great things.
SINDHULI HIGHWAY
I enjoyed reading ‘History in the making’ (#407) because it gives us an overview of the present and links it with the past. The highway will offer a much-needed shortcut to eastern Nepal, and will save enormous wastage of fuel and time.
Datta Tray Roy, email

Finally there is a piece of news not related to politics, or corruption or any other war. At long last, a constructive item of news. Let’s hope Sindhuli will lead to more roads being opened for development.
Pravesh Saria, email

Thanks to Rupa Joshi for an interesting write-up and brilliant pictures about the Sindhuli Highway. The highway will open up not just the access to the eastern Tarai from the plains, but will also open up the possibility of a parallel East-West Highway in the hills by linking Nepalakh to Dhankuta along the Sun Kosi.

UNITED REGIONS
USAID is very pleased with the Nepal Times’ coverage of the USAID-supported program to promote exchanges between Madhesi and Pahadi journalists (‘Uniting hills and plains’, #406). The objectives of this program were to increase fair representation of Madhesi and Pahadi issues in local media and promote social harmony. The activity also provided internships to Pahadi and Madhesi print journalists at regional newspapers, with Madhesi interns working in Pahadi-owned papers and Pahadi interns working in Madhesi-owned papers. USAID proudly supports similar initiatives because we believe that they promote mutual understanding which can help further peace in Nepal. Once again, I would like to thank you for publicly recognising this important program.
Beth S Paige, Mission Director, USAID/Nepal

WE BELONG
That was an emotional and touching editorial (‘We belong together’, #407). But reading the past few editorials in Nepal Times I get the feeling the editor is losing hope. Are you? Please don’t, yours is the only paper that offers us a silver of hope in this otherwise desolate political landscape.
John Chhetri, email

Just a line to say how much I liked the editorial about Meera Thapa. Having been born in north-eastern India, I know exactly how she feels. But I wonder if what brought tears to her eyes was the Tara Debi song or the shambles she found her mother country in: garbage on the streets, garbage in the politics and garbage in the economy. She was crying for her beloved country and what we have reduced it to.
Kumar Ghising, Kathmandu

I just wonder after reading your editorial whether ‘Nepali emotionalism (as distinct from Nepal ‘nationalism’ or ‘patriotism’) is a hill-defined sense of who we are as Nepali.

Chaudhary Group spreads its wings beyond Nepal

Nepali multinational

KIRAN NEPAL

“We now have to let economic agenda take centre stage in Nepal,” says Binod Chaudhary, “we are done with politics.”

The 53-year-old head of the Chaudhary Group (CG) says this is the reason he agreed to become a UML-nominated member of the Constituent Assembly along with other businessmen.

“This is why my colleagues and I joined the assembly. We now want to make sure that the economy takes centre stage,” Chang Seng Hock said in an interview after being selected as the Nepali Times Company of the Month for July.

Binod Chaudhary has a lot to be proud of: a third-generation Nepali Marwari business family that has become Nepal’s first multinational with over $500 million in assets and revenues.

Forbes Asia recently called ‘among Nepal’s richest non-royals’.

Chaudhary’s Cinnovation group with its hotel division has invested in tourism, manufacturing and trade, owning hotels in New York, Malaysia, Maldives and Sri Lanka. The group is still in full expansion mode with partners to set up luxury hotels in Singapore, Thailand and Bali.

But Chaudhary still sees Nepal as his base. “You have to have a certain mindset to be a global player,” he says, “but our roots are here and I get the greatest satisfaction from being able to invest and create new jobs in Nepal.”

Indeed, ever since taking over from his father Lunkaran Das Chaudhary and starting a department store in New Road in the 1970s, CG is now the biggest business player in Nepal literally ‘Touching Life Everyday’, as the company’s motto has it. CG’s WaWa instant noodle is a recognised and established brand not just in Nepal but in 20 different countries. CG’s trading wing sells LG electronics and Maruti.

“Entrepreneurship only really took off after the Panchayat, but even through the difficult period after 1990 there has been dramatic growth in business in Nepal,” says Chaudhary. “In fact, if there were right policies and proper governance, Nepal’s economy could really take off.”

Chaudhary says Nepal should now concentrate on core areas like manufacturing, hydropower, financial services and tourism and would like to work to make investment possible in these sectors as a member of the CA.

In CG, the company itself is investing in a 2 million ton annual cement plant in Nepal consuming 2.6 million tons of cement annually, and this is expected to grow at 15 per cent a year.

Chaudhary also sees no other alternative but to invest boldly in hydropower in a big way to reduce Nepal’s growing balance of payments gap with India. His group alone is involved in studying several projects in the 5 MW-600 MW range totaling 1,700 MW. Investment in cement, tourism and hydropower alone could create hundreds of thousands of new jobs.

“If there is one job that is really easy in the world, it is to raise capital through mutual funds, venture capital. All you need is a track record and a good idea,” he says. Chaudhary is confident that with proper support there is no reason why up to 10 other Nepali businesses can also expand their overseas investments.

Chaudhary is not as pessimistic as others about a new government led by the Maoists. He says the regime change is an opportunity for Nepal to be more focused on private sector-led growth, provide an investment-friendly climate for domestic and foreign investors and allow industries to spread their wings in an unfettered way.

Chaudhary has one pet-idea that he says could immediately increase national income: train 50,000 workers waiting to go abroad in English and basic skills to double their monthly income.

This, he says, will have an immediate impact on remittances.

ECONOMIC SENSE

after coming above ground two years ago. It is when regulators start acting as facilitators for powers-to-be then you can be sure new pages are being written in this country’s economic history.

The Maoists supposedly have acquired an ailing hospital project to set an example for a low-cost public healthcare service. While it is heartening to see a hospital being trying to emulate the Cuban model of quality healthcare for all, we can only wait and watch to see the gap between showcase schemes and reality.

After using strong-arm tactics in business decisions on tender allotment, natural resource allocation and building roads through UNESCO Cultural Heritage Sites, they have finally struck big. If this is Hydropower Capitalism 1.0, then it leaves us wondering what the later versions will be like.

Your weekly Beed has often given the Maoists the benefit of doubt, especially after they emerged as the leading party in the Constituent Assembly elections. But we have also misread worries about them hijacking the economic agenda. The Maoists do have to show results, granted, but this is not the time for a Cultural Revolution-style utopian experiments.

Government or party-sponsored social service delivery has been tried and tested round the world. It has failed the sustainability test. Even in socialist countries, healthcare and education is left to innovative models of partnerships between communities, private sector and government. Perhaps in Nepal, the Maoists should learn from models that have failed miserably.

The impending uncertainty over the new government will eclipse the economic agenda for some more time. Despite the budget being around the corner, no one seems to be in any particular hurry to address fiscal issues. The budget seems to be a mere formality.

Spiraling international oil prices have made another price hike inevitable and the serpentine queues are here to stay. The populist temptation to dole out subsidies and freebies will undermine the budget. There are no free lunches, especially for developing countries like ours. And given our governance crisis and disharmonious problem solvers will not pour water on sand for much longer.

Investors have not been convinced about the sincerity of the Maoists about guarantees to private property. The rise of crime and anarchy is seriously worrying investors already here. However, businesses are also looking out for opportunities during this state of confusion by bringing the powers-to-be thereby continuing the legacy of business-politics nexus dating back to the Panchayat era. Surely, as this columnist has been often pointing out, a few business people will gain when the experiments of new forms of capitalism is on.

If political parties are going to be forcing banks to invest in hospitals, schools and media then surely they can be convinced about the sincerity of donors will not pour water on sand for much longer.

Debt trap
Editorial in Naya Patrika, 7 July

The Maoist’s foreign policy, especially pertaining to foreign aid and borrowings, is a subject of much conjecture. It’s not only because of the revolution or their Maoist ideology that has raised questions about their stance on foreign aid. Instead, it’s about how our social and economic policy should be formulated in a ‘new’ restructured Nepal. The plans of the Maoist leaders and the Chief of the Foreign Department to phase out support from IMF and the World Bank is causing added interest.

The reality is that our foreign debt overhang takes up a large part of our budget, and it’s time we took some solid steps and independent decisions to plan out our economic strategy and areas of investment. The debt we have accumulated over the years are intimidating, and Nepal will require foreign budgetary support and loans to develop infrastructure. At the same time, we should make our own conditions for taking support from donor countries clear. The power to decide what’s best for Nepal should not lie in the hands of any third party, it should be our decision. And there is an urgent need to first create national consensus within the country.

Yubaraj Ghimire in Samaya, 10 July

Jhala Nath Khanal has made two blunders in the two weeks since he took over the UML which have put the party’s reputation at risk. First, during the discussions relating to presidency, Khanal betrayed the seven-party alliance, sidelined the NC and piggybacked on the Maoists. There is disagreement within the UML about this decision. One faction thinks Khanal did the right thing because he is trying to ensure that Madhab Kumar Nepal gets a respectable position. But there are dissidents who think Khanal just wants to save his general secretary position by kicking Nepal upstairs. Khanal’s plans have backfired and even Nepal is now accusing him of character assassination. Other leaders of the seven parties think that Khanal is an opportunist and even the Maoists disapprove him. In the past, Khanal and the UML had been critical of the Maoist YCL for taking justice into its own hands. They have criticised YCL for their methods, for perpetuating violence and have demanded that group be disbanded.

But as soon as Khanal took over leadership of the UML the first thing he did was form a ‘Youth Force’, which has since been spreading terror and violence. Last week they caught two Labour Ministry officers supposedly taking a bribe. They manhandled the officers and took them to the police. The Youth Force is a part of the UML, which is a part of the governing alliance. One wing of the same party is out on the streets taking justice in its own hands. Needless to say corruption is rampant in the public administration and the justice system is too weak to check corruption. But the Youth Force is following the YCL’s example of exacting summary justice. If the Force is serious about curbing corruption, it should start by probing the assets of some UML leaders.
We crossed the muddy unpaved road and finally reached the Dailekh capital at 4.30 PM to exhume the body of murdered journalist, Dekendra Raj Thapa. At the request of FNJ, the district administration of Dewari VDC had deployed police to investigate the area where Thapa may have been buried four years ago.

The Maoists, who were responsible for Thapa’s torture and death, were infuriated by the investigation. They put pressure on CDO Krishna Shyam Budathoki, badgering him with questions like: “On whose authority did you send the police to that area?”, “How can you be sure that the body is located there?”

Eyewitnesses had provided information that Thapa was buried 150m from Dewari Secondary School in a nearby jungle between two rocky outcrops. Journalists themselves had guarded the suspected burial site until the police arrived.

In June 2004, the Maoists had obstructed the water supply to Dailekh’s capital. Hoping to mediate, Dekendra Thapa and other journalists arrived at Tuli VDC on 23 June. But Thapa was lured away and kidnapped by the Maoists and taken from village to village. During this time, the extent to which he was tortured is still unknown.

However after one month when he was finally taken to Dewari eyewitnesses say he was hung upside down with his feet tied up and tortured till he died on 10 August. The Maoist involved, Bam Bahadur Khadka of Katli, is now a PLA commander in Nepalgunj.

Despite repeated requests from the Thapa family and FNJ the Maoists never released the body. However when information was received on the possible location of the body, it was decided that it should be exhumed. Forensic specialists Dr Wasti, police officers and other journalists started digging and in one hour, they found a piece of shirt and then a skull and femur. There was a pair of shorts and a shirt on the body. The left leg and right elbow were broken.

The bones were packed in a plastic bag and taken for DNA examination. Before heading back to Kathmandu, I had to pay one last visit to Dekendra’s mother, Gangadevi. She burst into tears on seeing us. “Until the body was found, I still had hope,” she told us, “I had never given up hope.”

In furniture heaven

Designers face burgeoning demand from Kathmandu’s consumers

Fusion says it sells “furniture of the future”. The straight-edged and elegant European styles are striking to look at, easy to deliver and assemble. The speciality here is office furniture, mostly made in Nepal from pre-laminated particle board. Home furniture is imported. With a new range of fabulous new pieces sold with lengthy warranties, Fusion claims a 95 per cent repeat order rate.

Akarshan Interiors, Kopundole

With creative, innovative and stylish furniture available, buyers no longer need to travel abroad. The designs here are simple but elegant and artistic. Specialising in wrought ironwork, the shop has diversified into wood, cane and hemp products. Unadorned by the usual painted glossiness, the wrought iron furniture keeps a natural look. Look out for the artistic handiwork on both indoor and outdoor items.

Emporium, Teku

If there ever was a furniture heaven, chances are that this is it. The displays are top quality, imported brands like Kian from Malaysia. Where doors are meant to slide, they glide smoothly. You won’t find warped runners and wobbly wheels. Chair designs are ergonomic, and this is truly an emporium of designs, offering Scandinavian, classic and modern shapes. Owner Siddhartha Gopalan helps his customers by being a ready interior design consultant.

A bed to sleep on, a dining table and a couple of sofas in any old design at minimum prices, and you think you’ve got yourself a deal. After all, furniture is all about practicality, right? Think again.

Furniture is about style, design and for some, luxury and an idea of perfection. In the brightly painted new housing colonies springing up on Kathmandu’s outskirts, the talk is of interior décor and boutique furniture outlets. As middle-class consumers embrace a lifestyle culture, more people are looking beyond simple function to aesthetics, enduring quality and named brands. With increased purchasing power and more sophisticated tastes, they are willing to invest in a picture-perfect home.

Woodcraft, Kumaripati

With its luxurious and elaborately carved designs and classical look, the furniture at Woodcraft comes straight out of the pages of a Jane Austen novel. Featuring authentic Nepali aankhe jhyal and sofa chairs with personalised carving, Woodcraft is a trend-setter in the growing demand for the ‘antique’ look. Woodcraft is also an interiors contractor, but prefers large projects such as the Soaltee Crowne Plaza Hotel.

Biram, Lagankhel

Bira provides its customers with a range of products which are customised at its own factory or imported from China. There are, for example, at least 30 distinct types of sofa to choose from. Complete bedroom furniture sets and dining sets are available, as well as services for wall paneling, laminated flooring and upholstery. Bira also features modular kitchens, which can be mixed and matched according to the customer’s needs. With a wide range of prices, Bira caters to a variety of tastes.

Mac Décor, Kopundole

A diverse furnishings showroom, the new and revamped Mac Décor provides customers with a wide range of choices, from fun bedroom furnishings for children to elegant carved tables and sofas. The store displays locally designed products as well as high-quality items from Chinese manufacturers. The products remain affordable despite their quality.

Homemaker, Mallighar

Homemaker mass produces customised designs. It believes that minimalism is more practical and requires less maintenance. Even so, the designs are attractive and Homemaker has exported furniture to countries like Japan and Germany. Homemaker is also an interiors contractor and sells beautiful accessories like lamps, and paintings. Its emphasis on elegance can be seen in the Scandinavian style shop design in Thapathali.

Woodcraft, Kumaripati

Specialising in meticulously crafted wooden furniture, this shop provides exclusive, original products made of seasoned wood. Offering made-to-measure designs for both home and office, Woodcraft’s traditional and authentically styled furniture ranges from medium to high prices.
Soldiers in the PLA cantonments are surviving on Rs 60 per day while the Finance Ministry continues to hold back their wages, unpaid for the past one year because of claimed Maoist violations of the peace agreement.

Under the 23-point accord negotiated by the seven-party alliance and the Maoists, the PLA troops were supposed to receive a monthly salary of Rs 3,000 to remain in the cantonments. This was paid for the first seven months but stopped in July last year, according to Avinendra Kumar Shrestha in the Office of the Central Coordinator for Cantonment Management.

Finance Minister Ram Shanram Mahat blamed the delay on the Maoists’ not keeping their end of the bargain, including not furnishing proper accounts and failure to return property they confiscated during the war. Part of the agreement stated that the payment of PLA salaries and the return of seized assets would progress simultaneously.

“The accord must be implemented in a package,” said Mahat. “If they do not return the property, the ministry will not release the funds.”

The total amount of unpaid salaries for the nearly 19,000 qualified PLA soldiers now totals more than Rs 500 million. The government disbursed Rs 1,771,903,400 through Peace Fund and Ministry of Peace and Reconstruction for cantonment management. An additional Rs 933,138,729 was given for infrastructure, medical expenses and energy through the concerned ministries.

Government records show a total of Rs 535,859,000 was disbursed for six months of salaries for qualified PLA soldiers and disqualified combatants at different dates till April 2007. A consolidated sum of Rs 1,533,623,200, which includes a monthly salary for the PLA was handed over to Communication Minister Krishna Bahadur Mahara in July last year.

The committee has released Rs 692,422,200 for rations of the PLA soldiers at a monthly basis from April 2007 to July 2008. The ministry transfers this money to the local Cantonment Management Office at the concerned districts and the local office hands it over to the PLA commanders. These commanders provide the ministry with the salary receipts to make sure the money is actually received by the individuals of the cantonments.

So for the past one year the soldiers have been sharing out funds intended for ‘cantonment management’ to obtain basic necessities like food and water, Shrestha said.

Although many ex-guerrillas are finding it hard to make ends meet, the PLA has made little noise about the unpaid salaries, causing suspicion in some quarters that the money meant for the combatants had gone straight into the party coffers for use in electioneering.

What happened to the PLA’s missing salaries?

“There is a surprising hush-hush even among the Maoists about the unpaid amounts. It is as if they don’t want this investigated because it would uncover past money being diverted to electioneering,” one Finance Ministry source told Nepal Times.

The guerrillas say they haven’t complained because they trust their leadership to resolve the problem. “The party has our interest at heart and is fighting for us,” said one.

“All of course we care,” said Maoist leader Dinanath Sharma. “Their problem is also our problem.” He said that the salaries that were paid were the result of constant pressure from his party.

But the new government is nowhere in sight, everything else is in limbo. Even after UMIN’s term expires on 22 July, however, a smaller team of arms monitors is expected to stay behind in the cantonments.

in BARDYIA

Travelling west on the East-West Highway between Bardiya and Sukla Phanta till as recently as ten years ago one passed unbroken hardwood jungle with occasional settlements.

Today, there are a few scrappy patches of forests, and even these have no undergrowth because of over-grazing. The national parks themselves show signs of encroachment.

The most dramatic deforestation has taken place in the two years after April 2006, as political parties, the lawless, criminals and illegal loggers have all used the weakness of the state to clear the jungles. And this process turned into open extortion after April 2006 and especially in the runup to elections, they say. “The Maoists used timber to generate funds, and at election time they converted the forests into votes by encouraging villagers to cut trees and grab land,” says IP
The most visible casualty of the past two years of political instability has been wildlife. Well-armed poachers enter the national parks bordering India at will, using the absence of army patrols to kill rhinos, tigers and other wildlife. The worst affected are Bardiya and Sukla Phanta in western Nepal, which were relatively well protected during the war.

The withdrawal of the army from checkpoints within the park during 2001-2007 saw increased poaching. A tiger census in Sukla Phanta between January-April showed that the number of big cats was down to only five from the 23 tigers ten years ago. There has been a dramatic decline in rhino populations in nearby Bardiya as well, with five killed in the past six months alone. Last October four rhinos were killed in a three-week period. Most of these are among the 83 rhinos translocated from Chitwan in the 1990s.

A census last June showed there were only 31 rhinos left in the park, and another count in February showed the number was down to 22. Even Chitwan has been affected. Four tigers were poisoned in the past three months, and sacks of tiger skin and bones were confiscated. Nine rhinos were found in Chitwan last year with their horns hacked off.

“If this goes on at the rate it is going, the only tigers and rhinos left will be in the zoo,” says Annapurna Nanda Das, of the Department of National Park and Wildlife Conservation in Kathmandu.

Poachers are getting more audacious, are better armed and use the international border. In April, rangers in Thakur Dwar in Bardiya found the hornless corpse of a rhino and next to it the body of a soldier killed by poachers armed with assault rifles.

The army says the situation inside the national park is getting more dangerous, but budget is tighter and there is heavy encroachment. “Since we are not allowed to patrol with guns in the buffer zone, poaching has increased in the recent months,” admits Col Samir Singh at Bardiya.

Under the comprehensive peace agreement, the army is not allowed to patrol the buffer zone with arms, and conservationists say this is the reason why poaching has increased. (See also: ‘Parking the army’, #391). The other reason is that the intelligence network among villagers in the buffer zone broke down after the war.

Outrage: A male rhino with its horn hacked off found in Bardiya National Park in April, and (below) bullock carts full of concealed timber head off into India at the border in Banke.

Kharel of Jana Morcha. The Maoist leader heavily involved in deforestation, Pradip Chaudhari, was nominated by the Munitsis to the CA.

Maoist leader Matrika Prasad Yadav has served as the Minister of Forests, and deniers reports that his party has been involved in illegal logging, accusing timber smugglers of making the allegations after he stopped them. When approached by Nepali Times, Yadav said cryptically:

“You find out who is logging and write about them, I’m not going to tell you who is or who is not involved.”

Although deforestation has been most dramatic in the west, it has also been intense in Rautahat, Mahottari, Dhanusa, Sindhuli and Sina, officials say. Keshav Rai Kamle, director general at the Department of Forests, says logging can’t be controlled because thieves have political protection.

“When you arrest an offender, you get a call from the Prime Minister instructing to release him, what can you do?” he asks.

There are no statistics about how much of the forest was lost during elections, but the estimate from Kailali alone is 21,000 hectares. Kailali DFO Man Bahadur Khatik says the past two years have been a free-for-all.

“Before our eyes, we have seen dense forests turn into dense settlements,” he says.

Krishnaraj Subedi, a member of a community forest committee, says 902 hectares of illegally settled forests were recovered, last year but the political parties pressured them to return the land. “Now we don’t even bother.” he says. Loggers who are caught red-handed have to be released because of political pressure, says a forestry official.

Even the national parks, which are guarded by the Nepal Army are not spared. Large tracts of forests on the eastern edge of Sukla Phanta Wildlife Reserve have been occupied since January by people who say they were never compensated when the nature reserve was expanded 10 years ago.

Says a security source at Sukla Phanta: “We can’t do anything about the squatters, they have political protection.”
France has officially taken over the presidency of the European Union this month. Nepali Times asked French Ambassador in Kathmandu, Gilles Henry Garault, about the Irish ‘no’ vote, concerns about democracy in Europe’s periphery and in Nepal.

«Democracy is not a unique concept»

Nepali Times: As France takes over the presidency of the EU, how do you look at the challenges ahead for Europe especially in light of the Irish ‘no’ vote for the Lisbon Treaty?

Gilles Henry Garault: All 27 countries of the EU must ratify the Treaty of Lisbon before it can enter into force. Twenty of the 27 member states have done so in parliamentary processes. However, on 12 June, the treaty was rejected in a referendum in Ireland. But European institutions must continue to evolve to meet the demands of an enlarged Europe. The treaty still exists.

The French strategy during our presidency will be the same: take time to think about the situation. The Irish people have voted, we are sorry they took the decision, but we respect their choice.

But doesn’t the Irish vote and the referendum in Denmark, France and the Netherlands show that Europeans are concerned about the speed of these dialogues too? I don’t think so. Europe is not complicated: it is simply under construction. Europeans are well aware of this, since they place ever-greater demands on Europe in terms of the environment, climate, security and defence. Moreover, the house of Europe is clearly unfinished. Even if Europeans agree on Europe’s main priorities, they still hesitate over its future, and sometimes simply change their minds or have to adapt to new circumstances. They may decide to change the purpose of a room or move around the furniture.

One of the core values of the EU is democracy, human rights and a free press. Yet, in the periphery of Europe we see these values threatened. What is being done to clean up Europe’s own backyard? Difficulties and tensions do exist with regards to the situation of human rights in the periphery of Europe. In Caucasian countries, Russia and Central Asia particularly, the respect of fundamental liberties and human rights are problematic. The EU, as part of the human rights component of the Common Security Policy, has developed specific tools to promote its core values in such peripheral countries. It has set up human rights dialogue with five countries of this region. In Uzbekistan the EU imposed sanctions on arms trade and visas in 2000 and it started a human rights dialogue last year after which the situation has improved to a certain extent. The EU was the co-author of the resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly last year to denounced human rights violations in Belarus.

Yet, we see from examples of Burma and Zimbabwe that there is little the EU can do to help pro-democracy activists in those countries. It is not right to state that the EU is not an active and efficient supporter of pro-democracy activists or can do nothing to improve the situation in the Burma or Zimbabwe. We have issued many statements condemning the violation of human rights in these countries. Besides, these two countries are subject to EU sanctions.

The EU requested a special session on Burma of the Human Rights Council, which was held in December of 2007 and this event led to the adoption by consensus of a resolution condemning the harsh repression of peaceful Burmese demonstrators. We have also carried many denunciations on Zimbabwe, we have clearly stated that the recent presidential elections were not free and fair. The EU is putting pressure on the current governments of these countries and I am sure we will see the results of these actions, at least in the medium and long term.

There are concerns in Nepal about the erosion of democratic values and press freedom. Do you share these concerns? I have heard these fears being voiced, especially after the activities of Maoist trade unions in certain media. But you have to remember that democracy is only 55 years old in Nepal, and there have been many ups and downs. Of those 55 years there were only 25 years of real democracy.

If you consider its history, it could be that democracy is not a unique concept. It may be too soon to speak about a threat to democracy and press freedom, we have to wait and see. But if there are any serious violations of democratic principles and press freedom, you can be sure that we will never hesitate to speak out against it.

Last month, you issued a statement on behalf of the EU condemning the arrest of Tibetan activists in Kathmandu. The Europeans seem not to want to understand Nepal’s geopolitical reality. We perfectly understand Nepal’s geopolitical reality. But we are not asking something impossible. We simply want Nepal to adhere to international human rights principles and conventions of which it is a signatory in dealing with Tibetan activists. The media in France is full of images of police crackdowns in Kathmandu against protesters and there is a strong public opinion against the arrests. France has never supported a Free Tibet, but there are certain aspects of the Tibetan cause that we protest that have to be respected, whatever the circumstances are.

In December, when tourist buses were vandalised and when the Chief Justice’s car was smashed the police stood by and did nothing, and yet, the Nepali police are more firm towards the Tibetans.

France did not accept a Maoist-designated Nepali ambassador last year. What was the reason behind this? Do you have any problems for the next ambassador designate? We have absolutely no problems accepting a Maoist-designated ambassador. We draw the line at war criminals and people whose hands are covered in blood like the Kmer Rouge. In this particular case the ambassador was named two days before the Maoists left the government, and we took a wait-and-see approach. Then, elections were postponed, this was a bad signal. The Maoist-ruled government was appointed in December 2007, when the Maoists finally re-entered the government, the ambassador designate was appointed and the Maoists committed Child Welfare. No one else was named in her place. We are still waiting. It’s not a good thing to have an ambassador in Paris for two years.

The EU has no coherent strategy on many issues. Europe has only sketched economic policies towards Russia, Ambitions, but no game plan, to become a player in the Middle East. And, despite its original leadership on the Kyoto Protocol, no successor program on climate change. And the biggest question of all: how to engage with China, India, and other giants of the future, has received virtually no attention from EU-level policymakers.

These issues require attention now, and an integral part of that search for new global strategies should be to invite, rather than avoid, criticism of its activities. If the EU is to lift its gaze from its navel to the horizon, it must reconcile the very different views that exist across Europe of its place in the world and its own best interests. The counter-pressure, of course, is that EU officials feel isolated and unsupported. There is an almost embattled culture among many senior officials, who fear that failing the flammes of dissidence among Europe’s voters could one day knock European unity off course.

Euroskepticism represents everything the Euroskeptics dislike. They worry that politicians and journalists who oppose their strategies for closer political and economic union could yet tip the balance of public opinion against the EU. Euroskeptic politicians elected to the European Parliament are often treated with the disdain that true believers reserve for the refusil.

The EU should lift its gaze from the navel to the horizon. Yet it is ludicrous to think that Euroskepticism represents a silent majority that could rise up and destroy the EU. There are now no EU countries where Euroskepticism is in the majority, and the widespread impression that citizens in Western and Eastern Europe alike are hating their shocks on the EU is wrong. The reality is that even though voters may find the EU, the single market or the Union is not a popular, the need for Europe to unite in a world where China, India, and other fast-developing countries is set to challenge it.

Reassured by this glass of wine of support, the Euroskeptics should be facing a much more pluralistic approach to EU policymaking and debate. The Commission should be organizing public debates that give equal prominence to dissenting views. Euroskeptics must learn that Euroskepticism is fundamentally healthy, because it invites closer examination of the policy options open to Europe, and thus increases the investments Europeans are making in the EU’s policymaking process.

For half a century, Europe’s integrationists have sought unquestioning acceptance of their efforts. That demand must be met. The only way forward is for Europe and its people to have their say, however uncomfortable that may be. • Project Syndicate

One morning last month, sub-inspector Premprasad Regmi and head-constable Parbati Upadhya headed off from their station in Lalitpur to investigate a robbery in their precinct.

On the way there, the two passed a group of young men at Kanibahal, who looked like trouble. On seeing the constables, one of them produced a gun, shooting Premprasad on the chest and Parbati on her arm.

Parbati’s instinct and training took over. Seeing that she could handle only one person, she rushed to the one with the gun, wrestled him to the ground and pinned him down until backup arrived. “If I had to die, I would die bringing him down,” she recalled thinking.

Parbati’s courage got her promoted immediately to assistant sub-inspector. While she’s glad about how it turned out, she is happier that she lived. “This is a 24-hour job,” she says, “and I am sure anyone else in that situation would have done what I did.”

Not sure about that. The smile on Parbati’s face fades when she describes the lack of cooperation from onlookers. Even when she begged passersby to call the police station, no one helped. In fact, a shopkeeper rolled down her shutters.

“It’s disappointing,” she says sadly, “but I haven’t lost hope or my sense of duty towards the people.”

At 30, Parbati has been in the Nepali Police for the past ten years. She was the second woman from Kapilbastu to join the force and admits she always dreamed of being a policewoman.

“It was the uniform that first attracted me,” she smiles, “and I wanted to serve my country”. Back home, she’d worked shoulder to shoulder with the men. With most of her siblings in India, Parbati took over supporting the family even though she is the youngest. She is an ardent athlete and won the nationals in running.

Parbati says both sides of her family have fully supported her career, and the fact that her husband is also a police officer helps.

“This is a 24-hour job,” she says, “you can’t say I’m off duty, you have to be where you are needed no matter what the time or situation.”

Parbati thinks Nepali women shouldn’t doubt their capabilities, and they shouldn’t let anyone undermine their self-esteem. She says with confidence: “There is nothing we can’t do.”

ABOUT TOWN

- The monsoonal trough in northern India turned the wind direction from the west to a period of monsoon, resulting in the unsual sun that made the days hot and sticky. But the winds have righted themselves again, and the squall front is away again heading westwards. The first week of July was nearly dry in Kathmandu which also suffered below average precipitation for June. A fresh monsoon pulse is now high up and away from the Bay and this should bring us moderate to heavy showers in most of midhills districts and plains. Expect daytime temperature to go down, but the humidity levels will still be high.

o, the self-appointed traffic czar Baba-san is back with a bang. The man is one determined dude. While he was away, all his centerline concrete blocks were pulverised by colliding motorcycles, others have been charred by student groups protesting the fuel price hike, and yet the former Osaka traffic cop doesn’t give up on his one-man mission to save Kathmandu’s streets from chaos. At the very least, give the man a medal for trying. But the man underestimates the Nepali capacity for anarchy. the only way we can instill some discipline at the Jamal intersection is if we make him executive president and commander-in-chief with shoot-at-sight orders.

Seems like in this country we are cursed to live in never-ending excitement. You solve one problem and another one pops up, you resolve that and another agitated group starts agitating. No sooner had the three parties agreed on the fifth amendment after a two-month delay and got ready to push the bill through the assembly, the Madhesi brothers began to gherao the rostrum and paralysed the assembly for two weeks. It seems the kangresis had a hand in uksaoing the brothers as a delaying tactic to get the baddies to agree to make Koiralo prez. Some talmel seems to have been done, cos the Madhesis called off their daily charade of treating the aisles of the CA like Ratna Park.

Then it was the turn of the Tharuhatas, who want no truck with the Madhesis, and have therefore brought 22 Tarai districts to a grinding halt this week. It may take another couple of months to get that sorted out, but the Muslims are also murmuring about being lumped together with Madhesis. The Sherpas may soon announce a chukka jam at Base Camp unless their autonomy demand is met. The Dalits have stepped up their protests, and so have the Group of 8 ethnic groups still not represented in the CA. The government’s negotiation strategy is to grant everyone autonomy automatically, but unless Nepal immediately embarks on a campaign of territorial expansion, we’re going to run out of room for all the new federal autonomous regions. And even that won’t be the end of it. Chhetris are sure to come up with a demand for a Chhetri Chhetra, and the Bahun Liberation Front will have no option but to go underground.

Upendra Yadav speaking in Hindi from the assembly pulpit on Wednesday may have thrilled his compatriots down in the plains, but the man should know this is completely counter-productive. Televised live nationwide, that one speech did more to unite all Gurungs, Tamangs, Bahunas, Newars, Chhetris, Thakuris than anything the Chure Bhaktas and Janajatis have ever done with their sit-ins. No one would’ve minded if it was Maithili.

The good news is a government may formed. Bad news: it make take till next yer. That is why Gyanu must be looking down from Nagarjun and laughing his head off. The ex-king is taking his commoner status seriously, it seems. There was a 2 km queue outside the gate to wish him happy birthday on Monday, but he refused to let them in because Nagarjun is government property. But he did take a call from the PM and had a man-to-man chat on the hotline.

The UML ministers resigned nearly three months ago after their party’s humiliating defeat in the elections, but they are still living comfortably at their official quarters and commuting to work in official flag-waving cars. The five Maoist ministers also resigned, but are merrily bhasan garo-ing away at city functions and odao-ing dossalahs and stuff. Gyanu resigned asking and left Narayanhiti and gave up his official Jaguar and his Super Puma, yet the prime minister resigned two weeks ago and he is still sitting tight in Bahawal. Need the Ass say more?

The winners of the New Name Contest this week both pertain to garbage. Tied in first place are Suvekchya from TC who wants Ratna Park renamed Rotten Park and Vijay in UK who has changed Phora Darbar into Phohor Darbar.
