Dying for others

After the fall of Makawanpur Fort in May 1816, Gurkha defenders agreed to ratify the Sugauli Treaty with the British East India Company under which Nepal surrendered nearly half of its territory, and allowed recruitment of its fighters into the British military in return for retaining its independence.

Two centuries later, the practice of allowing our young men to fight and die for other countries continues. Over 2,600 Gurkhas were killed in the two World Wars alone, and they continue to die – 11 Nepalis in the British Army have been killed in action in Afghanistan in the past decade.

Britain’s Prince Harry is currently spending two weeks in the motherland of the Gurkhas with whom he served in Afghanistan. He is meeting families of those killed in Afghanistan, helping post-earthquake reconstruction, and going to visit Nepal.

The royal tour has revived a debate in Nepal to redefine Nepal-UK relations that allows Gurkha recruitment on the 200th anniversary of the Treaty of Sugauli. A day before Prince Harry landed in Kathmandu on 19 March, an association of ex-Gurkha soldiers sent a letter to British Prime Minister David Cameron with some uncomfortable questions: why are Gurkhas who fought for the British Empire subjected to discrimination? Why are families of those killed or disappeared in the World Wars still not formally informed?

Gurkha veterans are also not satisfied with pensions and other facilities despite winning a major legal battle in 2004 that allowed them to settle in the UK. But their children above 18 still cannot apply for UK residency, and say they are separated from their children in their old age.

Among the 60 demands the Macleans issued before launching their armed struggle in 1998 was one to stop the recruitment of Nepali nationals into the British and Indian armies. They still see it as an affront to Nepal’s sovereignty, although they are not pushing for a ban on recruitment anymore.

Lokendra Bista Magar of the UCNP (M) told Nepali Times, “Our youth must be ready to kill and die for our motherland, not for an empire that uses us as mercenaries to kill poor people like us in other countries.”

But retired British Army Captain Yam Bahadur Pun, President of the Gurkha Ex-Servicemen Welfare Association, says, “Instead of ending Gurkha recruitment, young Nepali men should be given alternatives. If they get better job opportunities here, they would not migrate to the Gulf or fight for a foreign country.”

The British Army is scaling back its uptake of Nepali nationals, recruiting only 128 last year, and this number is expected to decrease in the coming years. However, the British have separate agreements (to which Nepal is not party) to recruit Gurkhas on behalf of the security forces of Brunei, Singapore and Oman. Now, India also wants to supply Gurkhas to Brunei, sparking media criticism in Nepal.

Two hundred years ago this week, troops of the East India Company were advancing on Makwanpur Gadi, the hilltop fort guarding the southern approaches to Kathmandu Valley. The British wanted to teach the Gorkhali Kingdom a final lesson, and force its rulers to ratify the Sugauli Treaty that had been signed four months previously. As Jyoti Thapa Mani recounts in her recently-published book, The Khukri Bravery (reviewed on page 9) the heroic but demoralised Gorkhali defenders did not stand a chance when the Company brought up heavy artillery.

1815 marked the peak of the Gorkha expansion, with Makwanpur being the last surrender. It was all downhill after that. The Sugauli Treaty allowed Nepal to remain independent and isolated, but it sanctioned the appropriation of nearly half its territory, and started the practices of the recruitment of Nepalis into the foreign military which continues 200 years later.

Nepal was economically ruined by the war, and the loss of so much territory also meant an acute loss of tax revenue. The fighters were abruptly jobless, and the first seeds of what is now Nepal’s inescapable migrant economy were planted then: we started exporting young men to fight for a foreign army. Soon, there was a massive exodus of civilians, too, from Nepal’s mid-hills to India’s northeast and Burma.

The British didn’t just conscript soldiers, they also recruited indentured labourers for the sugarcane fields of the West Indies and Fiji. Many Nepalis were among those who sailed off from Calcutta, including the ancestors of Vidiadhar Surjynal Naipaul, the Trinidadian Nobel Prize-winning author.

The first Gorkhali fighters joined the Company even before the war formally ended. For two centuries since then, the British Gurkhas (called ‘Gorkhas’ in the Indian Army) have fought for the Empire. A total of 52,000 young Nepali men died during the two World Wars, emptying Gurung, Rai, Limbu and Magar villages of young men.

Nepalis are rightfully proud of the fact that our country has never known a colonial master. However, that was not because British India or China-Tibet could not overrun Nepal, but because they chose not to. It was strategically much more advantageous, and cheaper, to keep Nepal as a buffer. Both the British and the Chinese had sent their armies into Nepal, and what they saw of its topography convinced them that the unforegoing terrain made it virtually unGovernable.

Jung Bahadur, the ambitious general and progenitor of the Rana dynasty, initially aspired to restore Nepal to its former glory. To gauge whether it was worth going to war to regain territory lost in 1815, he became the first subcontinental monarch to cross the Black Waters to pay state visits to Britain and France in 1850. He was suitably impressed with British military prowess, and his descendants were inducted into the English, offering troops to quell the Mutiny in 1857, the Afghan Wars and other campaigns.

In 1923, after much lobbying in London and Delhi, Chandra Shumsher upgraded bilateral relations to formally recognise Nepal as a sovereign country. In 1937, Nepal became one of only four Asian countries with an embassy in London. But the sun was setting on the Empire, and when the British finally quit India in 1947, Nepal’s Rana rulers were deposed with Delhi’s help.

THE CHINA SYNDROME

Restoring Nepal’s own trust in itself is the more important task. The China Syndrome, Editorial, #800. I am very suspicious of Chinese apparent influence such as a communication satellite in Bokhara. What’s the point and why don’t they just cooperate in rebuilding? If China has ideas to keep Nepal honest, then welcome.

NO OIL FOR OIL

It seems quite obvious by now that OIL is an attention seeker (No oil for Oli, Om Astha Rai, #800). And it is also clear that internal Indian political dynamics played a role in extending the crisis. Nepal’s Prime Ministers have always had to go through a chain of people at the Indian Embassy in Kathmandu to reach out to Indian PMs. Oli felt this made Nepal a second class nation. None of this desire for state equality is had per se in itself

NO OIL FOR OLI

Nepal’s helpless situation, except the timing and methodology by which Oli chose to not bow down to the Indians couldn’t have been worse. The stand-off happened post-quake, Oli abused his authority and callously ignored the plight of 2.5 million quake victims all the while politicking about who should lead the reconstruction authority, meanwhile his clique profited off oil embargo. Whatever treaties signed will not alone for OIs atrocious behavior.

Forcing us to forget

As a society we have failed the victims of conflict in more ways than one.

In the 365 days of the calendar year, the UN has thought up a way to have basically every day represented by one issue or the other. Usually, this has meant that people working in each sector have a day or two in the year to mobilise around a certain subject. Whether it’s World Water Day or World Happiness Day or day to end all forms of discrimination, with truth-seeking for victims of conflict. And while we Nepalis often like to conveniently forget that there was an armed struggle in this country that left at least 15,000 people dead, that truth must not be forgotten. The struggle of those affected by that conflict will not be over until they are given some semblance of justice, whether it is through legal justice or simply by giving them access to the truth about what happened to their near and dear ones and why.

What is most upsetting is the way in which ordinary people see the inconvenience in acknowledging the truth and thus choose to ignore it. But, while each Nepali individual may not have been directly impacted by the conflict and the bloodshed it caused, the reality of the state’s protection of criminals and rampant impunity is an issue that affects us all. For example, those that feel pain and injustice regarding the recent murders in the Tarai must know that justice cannot be fought for alone and only for selective injustices. Civil society, and NGOs in particular, have hijacked the conflict victims’ agenda into cases represented by one civil society leader or another. For years, the victims were pitted against one another by parties and the civil society which profited from the division. Victims of state atrocities and victims of the Maoist atrocities were socialised to be suspicious and angry with each other. Now, they have finally come together and it’s high time that the rest of Nepali society gave these brave and persistent citizens the support and encouragement they deserve.

As a society, in many ways we have already failed the victims of conflict. People, not just politicians, stood idly by as an illegal bill was passed and two sham commissions were formed. It is common knowledge that the agendas of the TRC and the Disappearance Commissions are not victim-centric, but rather focused on firing out any opposing voices before pushing through what is effectively going to be blanket amnesty. Their tenures have passed a year already and they have only just drafted their working regulation.

With all parties focusing on forcing people to forget – much less investigate, expose and take cases to court – it is an uphill battle for the victims of conflict. Even their allies – civil society and NGOs – have moved on as funding patterns have shifted. But until the grievances of the conflict victims are publicly addressed and the impacted individuals are ready to move on with their lives, the fundamental and democratic principles of justice and accountability cannot be truly established in Nepal.

Climate change and lack of awareness is increasing the number of deaths from lightning strikes in the world’s most densely populated mountain nation

OM ASTHA RAI

When it started raining on a stormy afternoon last week, workers at a brick kiln in Chitwan district ran under a tree for shelter. Lightning struck the tree, killing two and injuring nine of them.

Nepal’s storm season got to a deadly start, and Itneesh Majhi, 13, and Rita Rai, 24, became the first fatalities from lightning this year. They are unlikely to be the last.

More than 100 people are killed by lightning in Nepal every year, with most of the fatalities in the pre-monsoon season. Thunderbolts have killed 547 people in the last five years, higher than any other natural calamity barring last April’s earthquake. Not even floods or landslides kill as many people, and government figures show the numbers are rising every year.

The Ministry of Home Affairs has been recording deaths caused by lightning since 2000. From 2010, the number of lightning fatalities has started exceeding 100 every year. One reason for the increase could be more accurate reporting of deaths due to lightning after the setting up of the National Emergency Operations Centre (NEOC) six years ago.

However, there also appears to be a correlation between the frequency and intensity of storms and global warming. Says climate scientist Ngaamitra Dalal: “It is not just that we have been recording lightning fatalities more actively now, they are indeed increasing and getting more deadly because of the increasing intensity of storms.”

A 2014 report in the journal Science states that lightning strikes are likely to rise by 50 per cent in the US within this century if global warming continues at the current rate. Nepal’s location on the southern slopes of the world’s highest mountains means it could get worse here.

“Nepal is not just mountainous, but it is also a region where cold air from the northwest collides with rising hot air from the southwest during the pre-monsoon generating more lightning than elsewhere,” Dalal explains.

The other factor is the lack of accurate weather forecasting, as well as insufficient public awareness about what to do when an electrical storm hits.

Government data shows that lightning strikes are more common in central and eastern Nepal than in the west, where most fatalities in Makawanpur district southwest of Kathmandu. As many as 23 people have been killed by lightning in this district in the last two years alone.

Interestingly, Kathmandu Valley has had no reported deaths due to lightning in the past two years. Sarosh Dhungel of National Academy of Science and Technology explains: “The fact that lightning kills so many people in Makawanpur but none in nearby Kathmandu is proof that awareness is key to saving lives during storms.”

Dhungel has been analysing the pattern and intensity of lightning strikes to forecast violent and potentially deadly electrical storms. He adds: “We have myths about lightning, but not much scientific knowledge about it.” Besides public awareness, Dhungel says a stricter building code is needed with lightning detection and protection system, especially in rural areas.

Triangular relationship

Madhesi leaders believe PM Oli has no intention of following through on his commitments

When Prime Minister K P Oli told a gathering in Belhukedur this week that he was on a “special mission” during his visit to China, I was reminded of remarks made by several Indian figures during a visit to Kathmandu last year. The blockade was just getting underway, and the former general of the Indian Army, Ashok Mehta baffled and puzzled said it was time for Nepal to choose between India and China. He almost sounded like a jilted lover in a triangular relationship.

As if the point wasn’t already clear, he went on to warn that China’s activities in Nepal were a serious threat to India. This reflected the Indian military establishment’s deep distrust of China, which despite cordial diplomatic relations between Beijing and New Delhi has bungled bilateral trade, hasn’t recovered from the humiliation of 1982. At the same press conference, former Indian ambassador to Nepal K V Rajan made a strong case for federalists, coming strongly on the side of disputed Tarai districts being amalgamated into future Madhes provinces. The gist of his argument, and indeed of the Indian foreign policy establishment, is that if the provincial boundaries were not settled as he suggested, it would create domestic problems in Nepal and that would affect India’s strategic interests. Which is why India couldn’t remain a mute spectator. The NC-UML coalition in Kathmandu then flip-flopped between two provinces and that it rectified to seven provinces after strikes in western Nepal for a united front. Indeed, it turned out as Rajan had predicted, boundaries became the focus of a violent protest movement that engulfed the Tarai and triggered a border blockade in which India got deeply involved.

The point of all this is that the blockade has actually ended up diluting Indian influence in Nepal on the Madhes issue. Oli has begged quite a few important trade, transit and investment deals with China during his visit, and the prospect of importing petroleum from China in future is still alive.

Even the Madhesi parties seemed to have taken the cue and went over to meet the Chinese ambassador and warned him not to engage the Oli government in any substantial deal because it would bypass the Madhes. And without a settlement of the Madhes issue Nepal would never hope to attain stability, which in turn would affect China’s strategic interests.

Interesting that Mehta and the Madhesi leaders both harked upon stability in Nepal as being in the national security interests of both India and China respectively.

Privately, Madhesi party leaders believe PM Oli is taking them for a ride and they don’t trust him to implement any of his promises to them. They think he is using the China Card to frighten India and defuse the Madhes movement. They find it suspicious that Oli did not sign a joint communiqué in New Delhi last month, as the Indian side wanted, which would have put down in writing his commitment towards the Madhes.

In that sense, the issues that were precursors to the violence in the Madhes and the border blockade have still not been addressed, and Oli (emboldened domestically by his visits North and South) is unlikely to honour his commitments.

Many analysts believe that Nepal should first resolve its internal problem and then reset relations with India and China. Oli has got it backwards, he is playing geopolitical games to dilute the genuine demands of the plains people for true autonomy.
Unintended Trans-Himalayan Consequences

Did New Delhi ever imagine that its coercive strategy would backfire this badly?

KANAK MANI DIXIT

It was the five-month blockade by India that provided Nepal’s political class with the daring to sign the deal in Beijing on Monday. Without the public opinion created as a result of that thoughtless adventurism, no leader, including KP Oli, would have gone the distance in inking the 10 agreements on transit, transmission lines, highways, railways, banking etc.

The enthusiastic language of Wednesday’s 15-point joint communiqué, replete with unusual terms like ‘remarkable’, ‘synergy’ and ‘momentum’, and China’s support for the new Constitution, were in sharp contrast to the studied expressions of the Indian authority during Prime Minister Oli’s visit to India last month.

It has suddenly become possible to talk to China as Nepal does with India after decades of running scared. The very term ‘connectivity’, used with such sanctity by Indian diplomats such as former Foreign Secretary and Nepal ambassador to Sri Lanka Saran is now being applied on the trans-Himalayan sector.

Ironically, India itself stands to benefit for having pushed Nepal into China’s embrace, because the development of trans-Himalayan linkages opens up possibilities not just for Nepal but both the giant neighbours.

The consternation evident in New Delhi over the Nepal-China bhal bhal atmospherics is a holdover from the past that does not do justice either to Nepal’s sovereign agency, nor India’s own rapidly evolving economic relationship with China.

Much of Delhi’s disquiet actually emanates from outdated strategic paranoia about the Himalayas that harks back to the defeat in the 1962 war. This mindset continues to regard the Himalayan ridge as a security barrier, using unconscionable pressure over the decades to block infrastructure development in Nepal.

If the panicked commentators in New Delhi would read a bit of history, the new opening to the north is actually a continuation of the Himalayan commerce that was pioneered by Kathmandu traders in Lhasa, at times even with powers of extra-territoriality.

The ten agreements now have to be converted into reality through protocols and diligent follow-up. Beijing itself is said to have been exasperated over the decades by the dilution of a Kathmandu’s ruling class fearful of Indian reaction.

It would be important for Nepal to hold off this time and allow Nepal to proceed with the agreed upon projects and programs. Indeed, both New Delhi and Beijing should trust Kathmandu to not allow activities minimal to their interests out of Nepal soil, while for their part they should desist from making demands that would make Nepal a closed society.

The agreement on transit rights is the most significant, and will help transform modern Nepal from being ‘India-locked’ to truly ‘landlocked’, with now the possibility of reaching third countries through the north. Certainly, the nearest port city of China is three times the distance from Calcutta, and the northern route may not see much use, but at the very least it will dissuade those who would want to use blockades as instruments of geopolitical coercion in the future.

No country can be expected to be excessively altruistic, and Nepal need not be too beholden to Beijing because China, including the Tibetan Autonomous Region, is sure to benefit in full measure from the agreements signed. If Nepal needs connectivity to the north, China too would benefit from crossborder transmission lines and the Kimmanthka Highway (once built) for quick access to the sea as alternative to the Nathu La and Jelep La in Darjeeling/Sikkim.

Much of the possibilities to the north depend on the viability of transport of goods by rail. The Qinghai-Tibet Railway from Beijing via Golmud has already arrived in Aghte and is plunging westward across the Changtang plateau along Nepal’s northern frontier. President Xi Jinping’s ‘One Belt One Road’ initiative relies on trans-continental transport of goods by rail being competitive with maritime shipping. If railway carriage turns out to be affordable, then Nepal stands to benefit immensely — through bilateral trade, third-country transit through China, as well as entrepot trade between India and China.

For now, the advantage of the transit agreement is strategic, with its guarantee of an alternative route to the world economy. It also carries the possibility of loosening Indian attitudes towards transit through Indian ports, as well as access to Meghna and Chittagong ports in Bangladesh.

If economic and infrastructural connectivity is truly the agenda of New Delhi as well as Beijing rather than a camouflage for strategic penetration, both should look at the great opportunities that Nepal holds for market synergies. If what New Delhi analyst Subasini Hyder writes is borne out, that “connectivity is the coinage for power in the future”, then Nepal as the country connecting the Middle Kingdom with the Ganga plains stands to gain.

Without exaggerating what has been achieved, a trigger was required for Kathmandu to dare to reach out for deals with Beijing. India activated that trigger with its blockade, and may thank New Delhi strategists for which is clearly a result of unintended consequences.
A renowned American sculptor, David Best, is known for dramatically setting fire to the wood art he creates. Best was invited to come as a tourist, but he was inspired to get involved in the project because it belonged to the new generation of people. To hell with history and old ways of doing things; that was my protection,” he explained, “It is about forgiveness and moving on with life.”

“Go completely new,” he adds: “Go from those homes and make something from scratch.”

For Best, the idea was for the stucture to be a tribute to his friend who died in a motorcycle accident. What started out as the burning of wooden memorials became an annual tradition. The festival asked him to build another wooden memorial the following year and Best dedicated it to people who have committed suicide.

“I am not a Jew, a Hindu or a Catholic so I thought about what I would dedicate the temple to if I were making a temple,” said Best.

For Best, the idea was for his commemorative wooden structures to reflect a place of loss and for the burning to signify closure and moving forward.

Best did not explain that the suicide memorial at the Burning Man Festival was a tribute to those who committed suicides, but 15,000 people spontaneously wrote their names on pieces of paper and put it inside the structure.

One of Best’s last projects was his Temple in Londonderry in Northern Ireland, commemorating those who died during the sectarian strife. “This was a collective temple, where everybody recognises and embraces a person,” he explained, “It is about forgiveness and moving on with life.”

The structure he built in Kuthmandu is not as large as his previous ones. It is made up of pieces of wood salvaged from the ruins of homes in Bungamati, and he will also not be burning the structure. The artwork will go back to Bungamati for the residents to do what they want with it.

“What I was hoping I would do is inspire the village to smile,” says Best. “What we brought to the village is that excitement about creating out of ruins. The village lost its homes, we got the wood from those homes and made something from scratch.”

However, Best feels discouraged by the current condition of the country. “One thing I will take back is the anger about bad water, fuel, the government, and the struggles between China and India,” he says. “It just makes me angry that there is such a thing in our world as a third world country. How can so few people have so much wealth and control so many?”

If Nepal is to rise out of the devastation it needs to be rebuilt to suit the youth of today, who should take charge and lead the way for the country.

He adds: “Go completely new because it belongs to the new people. To hell with history and nostalgia, forget the postcards.”
When I think of France, two things come to mind: food and love. And luckily for the rest of us, the French love sharing their adulation of food.

Goût de France, meaning ‘Good France’, returned for a second run in an evening of fine dining at The Chimney Restaurant, serving up a five-course menu celebrating classic French cuisine.

We were first served a baked cheese soufflé with Armagnac cheese fondue. Soufflé is derived from the French word souffler, which means “to breathe”, but the soufflé I was served was sunken and looked like someone had hit the air out of it. Still had a lovely, light texture and what it lacked in appearance it made up for in taste. The accompanying fondue served up another hit of cheesy goodness, infused with a generous dose of French brandy.

Next, we had the duck leg confit with white bean sauce on a bed of mash potatoes and steamed vegetables. To my surprise when I cut into the duck, the skin was soft. My understanding of duck confit is a dish that is browned in the oven until the skin is crisp. Still, the meat was fall-off-the-fork tender and deliciously flavoursful. The mash potatoes and bean sauce nicely balanced out the saltiness of the duck, making for a decadent meal.

We were then served a second main of prime tenderloin with bearnaise sauce and roasted vegetables. I found the doneness of the steak a little uneven, as the innermost portion was rarer than the rest. Nevertheless, the quality of the cut was excellent and the meat well-seasoned. The herb-infused bearnaise sauce lent a fragrant touch to the steak.

Next came a platter of French and Nepali cheese, served with fig compote and assorted nuts. The sweetness of the compote balanced out the sharpness of the cheeses, and the nuts provided a good crunch. With French cheeses like Camembert and Tomme de savoie served alongside local cheeses like Belbist, Kanchan, goat, and yak cheese, it was a celebration of the love of cheese shared by the two cultures.

Then it was time for the highlight of the night. By this time, we were quite full but as the old adage goes, there is always room for dessert. Besides savory dishes, the French are known for their sweet treats like macarons and meringues, so we knew we were in good hands.

Given a choice between two desserts, I went for the dark chocolate, coconut and white chocolate truffle with strawberry coulis while my dining companion had the trio-colour cold soufflé. Mine was a towering array of chocolate sculpted into intricate decorative pieces sprinkled with desiccated coconut. With so many sweet elements in the dish, the tartness of the strawberry coulis was the perfect accompaniment to balance out the flavours.

The trio-colour cold soufflé with mini opera cake. Like the previous dessert, it also came with an impressive chocolate sculpture. Although the dish was elegantly plated, it was a letdown in terms of flavour. The soufflé was much too heavy, with a texture more beffing of mousse instead.

Although the dinner had been a lavish treat, there were flaws in the execution of some dishes that detracted from the authenticity of the French fare. Still, it was a commendable effort, and with plans to introduce the five-course menu (Rs 5,000 plus taxes) as a menu at The Chimney Restaurant, perhaps they will undergo further refinement to attain the high standards of authentic French cuisine.

The sharp edge of history

A new book looks back at 200 years of Gurkha history

KUNDA DIXIT

Exactly 200 years ago this week, Nepali defenders were battling at Makwanpur Fort for the East India Company to attack. This was going to be a make-or-break battle to protect Kathmandu, and Nepal’s sovereignty. The Gurkhas ambushed the British, and a stall from a cannon exploded near the British commanding officer, Major General David Ochterlony, nearly killing him.

In her new book, _The Khukri Braves_, Yvonne Thapa Mani concludes: ‘If Ochterlony had been hit, the complexion of the Second Anglo-Gurkha War would have changed completely.’ Indeed, the Gurkha kingdom, having lost Garhwal and Kumaon, was basking in the Sughali Treaty. Learning from past experience, the British brought in two 18-pounder cannons and aimed at the fortifications. The Nepalis knew then that the game was up, and dispatched Chandrasekar Upadhyay at 2AM to Ochterlony with the Sughali Treaty duly signed and stamped.

Ochterlony wrote a receipt: ‘Received this treaty from Chudker Seokar Opedehas, agent on the behalf of the Rajah of Nepal in the valley of Makwanpur, at half past two o’clock on the 4th May 1816, and delivered to him the Counterpart Treaty on behalf of the British Government.’ (signed) Ochterlony, Agent, Governor-General.

It is details like these that make the book riveting. For from being a history text book with dry annotated text, it is an illustrated encyclopedia of the wars that shaped this country, a saga of how Nepali soldiers ended up two centuries later fighting for other nations. We learn, for instance, that Nepali soldiers had defected to the British side in 1815, even before the Anglo-Nepal War formally ended.

That first unit was called the Malan Regiment after the last big battle in Garhwal, which went on to become the 66th Gurkha Rifles and then the 1st Gurkha Rifles of the Indian Army after the British left. We learn that Mani’s own ancestors were part of the Gurkha Army in 1790 as it marched west, later they served in the Malan Regiment. Her great-great-grandfather was in the 66th Gurkhas and her great-grandfather Kali Ram Thapa fought in the 1st Gurkha Rifles. Mani’s military genes and her job as a newspaper designer make her the ideal person to package this history of Nepal’s famous fighting men.

The East India Company in Calcutta was a multinational trading house that represented the British state in the subcontinent, and had an army made up of Indian and Scottish mercenaries and Indian recruits. The expansionist British empire at its height in 1815 stretched along the Himalayan foothills for 2,000km from the River Sutlej to the Tista in the east. The Company was interested to find routes across the Himalayas, primarily to monopolize the lucrative trade in shatrunjaya, a fine wool made from the fleshy hair of baby antelopes found on the Tibetan plateau. But the Gurkhas controlled the Himalayan passes.

The Shah kings after Prithivi Narayan Shah had brilliant generals like Amar Singh Thapa and Subhadrachand Kunwar who waged a westward blitzkrieg conquering territory at astounding speed. But the supply lines had become too long, the Thapas and Pandes in Kathmandu were feuding, and principalities they had conquered started rebelling behind them.

Mani carefully recounts the steps of her ancestors, and visits the blood-soaked forts at Nalapani, Khalianga, and Jhyuchar. She becomes an archaeologist herself to pinpoint the location of Kangra Fort. These are names of battles etched in Nepal’s national memory, and _The Khukri Braves_ makes them all come alive. The book is superbly researched, illustrated with maps, as well as with then-and-now photographs of the famous forts that forged the histories of Nepal, India and Britain. We can follow the legendary battles, the bravery of the Nepali defenders who fought to the last. There is a gripping account of how Gen Bhikul Thapa charged British cannons at Malum, was hit, and his disembowelled stomach with his turban and proceeded to behold a whole list of enemy soldiers before falling.

Mani follows the exploits of the Gurkhas in later campaigns under the British. More than 100,000 young Nepali men served in the Western Front and in Gallipoli during World War I, and 22,000 were killed. In World War II, 250,000 British Gurkhas and Royal Nepali Army soldiers fought and died in Europe, in Burma and Malaya, 32,000 were killed. We find out that Nepali soldiers were on opposite sides in the Burma front, British Gurkhas fought fellow Nepalis from Subhas Charan Bose’s INA who were allied with the Japanese. Mani makes the distinction between Indian ‘Gurkha’ and British ‘Gurkha’ soldiers, and explains why it is a generic term and not an ethnicity. She includes a Hall of Fame of 13 Gurkhas awarded the Victoria Cross and Indian Army gallantry medals for action in wars against Pakistan and China. This book argues that Nepali soldiers can’t be called ‘mercenaries’, but even so it is a historical aberration that allows the nationals of one country to fight and die for another. Also, research into censored letters written by Nepalis in the trenches of Ypres show a less stereotypical, more human, Gurkha suffering from homesickness, fear and gloom.

The book has a useful guide to the Gurkha forts of northern India, and as citizens of this country we are left to ponder how we ourselves have honoured our brave forebears who died to save us a nation called Nepal.

Remembering the war

Sabina Adhikary (pic) joined the Maoist militia when she was just in Grade 8. For the next ten years of the People’s War, she fought on the frontlines of more than three dozen major battles, sustaining bullet wounds in both her legs. Since the end of the conflict, Adhikary struggles to make ends meet, living in a small hut in Terathum of Sindhupalchok.

The commander who trained her during the war, Nanda Khishu Prem ‘Comrade Pasang’, is now the Vice President of Nepal but former combatants like Adhikary struggle both economically and socially. Former Maoist combatants say that they feel let down by the party, which failed to provide them any support.

Adhikary said that even though their commander during the Battle of Beni on 20 March, 2005, is now the VP, most living guerrillas are no longer politically active. “As the anniversary of the battle nears, the wounds open up again,” she told banonline.com.

Instead, most injured combatants who fought at Beni, including Adhikary’s husband Tejching Garbhu, have left for work in the Gulf. Former fighters say it is difficult to find a job and a steady back into society since the ‘class-enemies’ they beat up and abducted during the war are still around.

“We have to struggle for our livelihoods in the same places we waged our class struggle,” said another former combatant.

He added that instead of caring for the injured and deceived combatants, the leaders were too busy accumulating wealth for themselves. They say the wounds and injuries they sustained during the war are constant reminders of all that they lost.

Still, many injured guerrillas from a decade ago have yet to receive any compensation from the government, having to take out loans for their treatment. The District Administration Office class 26 cases of unattended injured former combatants. “The state still thinks of us as the enemy. False victims have collected cheques whereas real victims like us have not received any relief,” said Adhikary.

HOMELAND SEASON 5

When Homeland’s first season premiered in October 2011, it made tidal waves in the television industry with its extreme, hawkish politics in regard to dealing with terrorists and protecting the United States (note the name of the series), the unexpected investment in a brilliant, abrasive female main character, the mentally unstable CIA agent Carrie Mathison (Claire Danes), and the dramatic story arcs that in today’s times are probably pretty close to reality – at least in terms of portraying the extremity that has manifested in multiple terrorist attacks across the globe.

Over multiple seasons the plotlines of Homeland became increasingly hysterical, an ill-thought out development that was embodied by the histrionics of Carrie Mathison herself, a troubling, complex character who portrays her struggle with bipolar disorder (also a rare thing in mainstream television) with great sensitivity, but suffers from repeating plots and triggers that make her troubles ever so slightly exasperating: Carrie’s mental illness elicits empathy with her character but her manifest personality even while she is taking her medication, is written, purposefully, to be banal.

This combination of violence, imminent gunfire and explosions, difficult characters, and Machiavellian CIA trade craft made it difficult to continue watching subsequent seasons of Homeland without having nightmares. Curiosity at the resilience of a show that was founded on an initially facile premise, but is now in its fifth season, compelled me to pick up watching the show again to see if anything has changed.

Thankfully, and wisely, both Homeland and Carrie Mathison have evolved for the better. Set now in a contemporary Berlin, Carrie has left the CIA, to the great disappointment of her mentor Saul Berenson (Mandy Patinkin) and is consulting as a security expert for the enigmatic Otto Düring (Sebastian Koch), an extremely wealthy German philanthropist who runs his own foundation. Carrie has a child, a little girl, she is in a stable relationship with Jonas Hollander (Alexander Fehling), a human rights lawyer for the Düring Foundation, and her world appears, finally, to be giving her the positive reinforcement and stability that she has lacked her entire life.

Unfortunately, a chillingly prescient terrorism plot (light of recent events in Europe) draws Carrie into a convoluted world of former CIA colleagues with opaque intentions. Peter Quinn (Rupert Friend), another agent from her past, re-enters her life, and the nightmare begins anew, but with higher stakes.

Full of surprises, good and bad, with two additional strong female characters in lead roles, several asyntactic plot lines that are, even with minimal hyperbole, hair-rising, and no less than four unconventional love stories that are absolutely captivating, Homeland succeeds in its fifth season because for the first time, the human relationships portrayed in it are grown up and believable, like Carrie Mathison herself.

So you want to be a volunteerist?

Well-meaning foreigners are being duped by fake orphans unknowingly contributing to a vicious cycle of abuse

MICHAEL NISHIMURA

In February 2014 the founder of Happy Home Orphanage in Bhaktapur, Shubha Pratap Acharya, was arrested on charges of fraud, kidnapping and child trafficking after years of physically and psychologically abusing the children at the home, most of whom were not orphans.

But Acharya was released one year later after it was shown that the case lacked sufficient evidence, largely due to alleged witness tampering by Acharya’s wife, Pooja. Today the couple continues to run Happy Home, business as usual, profiting from foreign volunteers and donors.

This is not an isolated story. For-profit and fake orphans are rife in Nepal, evidenced by the fact that over 80 percent of all the 600 registered orphans in the country are concentrated within the five tourist-beaty regions of Kathmandu, Pokhara, Chitwan, Ilam and Kaski.

During the conflict, child trafficking was a lucrative business as recruiters carried impoverished parents to give up their kids, promising an education and a better life. Instead they were marketed off as ‘conflict orphans’ in the city and in India. Since the end of the war in 2006, donors and volunteers armed with good intentions but lacking useful skills have flooded in, fuelling trafficking, sexual abuse and psychological harm.

“There is literally no rule that tourists can play in volunteering in children’s homes and orphans – there are no skills required that cannot be found within the professional arena in Nepal,” says Andres Navé, director of Forget Me Not, a Norwegian organisation that turned NGO that has worked to reconnect 58 ‘paper orphans’ back with their families.

Though technically illegal on a tourist visa, around 30,000 wall-masking foreigners each year are duped into forkig over hundreds of dollars per week each to volunteer at operations that masquerade as charities, unknowingly contributing to a vicious cycle of abuse.

Many of the ‘orphans’ they serve are not actually orphans – more than two-thirds of the 16,000 minors in children’s homes around Nepal have at least one living parent.

“One young girl who lived at one of these so-called cofflangees told me that the management use the orphans like crops, harvesting them for their own personal gain,” says Barbara Weidel, owner of Hole in the Wall Cultural Travel, who spent two years researching orphanage volunteerism. “This practice is nothing less than human trafficking and should be stopped at all costs.”

Though Nepal is a signatory to the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child and has recently updated its official Child Policy in 2012, direct action on sham orphans is not of vital concern since they provide what the government is neglecting – a social safety net for thousands of underprivileged children. The Central Child Welfare Board has been receptive to a surge of complaints, but lack the resources to maintain regulations.

Next Generation Nepal is another group working to return paper orphans to their families, with 367 successful cases thus far. It conducts rescue missions, takes children to a transit home for medical and psychological support, and then reconnects them with their families once they are identified.

Next Generation also works with various embassies and the government to discourage all volunteer-associated with orphanages. Its 2014 report states that institutional care hinders the development of these children’s necessary skills to survive in the external world.

“Even if you’re sure the orphanage is safe and the kids were not trafficked, it still causes attachment disorders for children that don’t grow up with a stable loving family,” says Country Director Martin Penna. “What they learn is that people come into your life for two months, love you and then leave. Not knowing how to form long-term relationships leads to depression, aggression and anxiety in the future.”

After last year’s earthquake that saw an inundation of funding and do-gooders, NGOs are tuned to promote more ethical ways in which volunteerists can contribute, focusing on cultural dialogue rather than a donor-beneficiary relationship. One way tourists can help is to do their homework by property vetting ‘development’ projects, talking to the community and making sure they have skills that actually match needs on the ground.

Says Punske: “It’s easy to tell people what not to do but hard to tell them what they can do. It is about not telling people they’re bad people but telling them how to do it volunteering in a more positive way.”

Afra being locked up inside a madness for ten days in his hometown of Inarwak in Nepal, Sadik Khan escaped and fled to Delhi. He had hoped for freedom, but just as he got off the train at the New Delhi Railway Station, the 12-year-old was caught by police and sent to live in a children’s home.

Shortly after he got there, six other Nepali boys were also brought to the shelter by the Sallam Baslak Trust in the teeming Til-Nanit area of the Indian capital. Like Khan, they had all run away from home, some came looking for work, others for adventure.

"On average we receive two to three Nepali boys each month," says Arpita Dwivedi of Child Welfare Committee (CWC) Mayur Vikar, one of several such committees in this city. Most Nepali boys are sent here because it is near the New Delhi railway station. They are first interviewed here, and then sent to live in children’s homes if immediate return to their families is not an option. Which is the case, almost always.

From 2010 to 2013, over 200 Nepali children lived in Central Delhi Homes, 84 per cent of them boys. Given that there are more than 500 children homes in the Indian capital and over 5,000 across India the total number of Nepali children here is estimated to be in the thousands.

The children mainly come from western Nepal and make their way through the open border, usually in groups of two to three. It is also easier for boys to cross borders without attracting attention, since police is mainly on the lookout for young women being trafficked.

Mamo Sri Subhakar, 17, from Bardiya has been coming to India for work since he was 13, and his last job was in a farm in Haryana where he earned INR 3,000 a month, but left because he was abused by the employer. He was apprehended by the CWC on his third trip while enroute to Mathura for a new job.

"I don’t like it here," Sunil has said after spending a month at a children’s home. "There are always fights, a lot of bullying going on. I just want to go back home." Most Nepali children felt the same way. Some like 11-year-old Bijay Bhatta tried to escape from the shelter but were caught and transferred to a government run shelter known to be a hub of physical and sexual abuse.

Many also accuse the staff of playing favouritism, and say they usually don’t help Nepali boys when they get bullied or beaten by others. The children are also enrolled in the formal education system only after a year of their arrival, and once it is determined that their family cannot be contacted. Until then they are given vocational training.

"I will never come back here again," says Mahendra Sonar who along with brother Shilpi and friend Karan came to Delhi from Banke. "All we wanted was to stay away from home for a bit."

However, many children are stuck because there is no official agreement between India and Nepal on repatriation of runaway children. These children then end up moving from one shelter to another until they turn 18 when they are asked to leave the homes and live on their own.

"There is a mentality especially among government officials that as long as the children are being fed, it’s okay no matter where they live," says Shaili Chau, co-director of Child Care Nepal which works to repatriate the children from abroad. "What many don’t realise is that it is in the best interest of the child to live with their families rather than grow up in an institutional setting."

Pushpa Arys, a welfare officer at shelter for boys in Alipur near Delhi says: "As soon as we receive a Nepali child, we contact the Nepal Embassy but they never give a positive response. We get 15-20 Nepali boys each year and it’s trouble for us to keep them here too."

We asked the Embassy about this allegation, and the reply was that it doesn’t have the required funds to organise repatriation trips. Furthermore, follow-up on cases are also rare when concerned officials’ tenure ends. Diplomats are also concerned about sending children back before verifying that they are indeed from Nepal. Says Second Secretary Shreejana Adhikari: "It is hard to differentiate who is Nepali and who is Indian. Thus, we have to make sure that each and every child going to Nepal is a Nepali Citizen."

Even though immediate repatriation seems like the most ideal option for the children, there’s also the question of where these children will go once they are brought back. At present the government operates only four homes all across the country.

"We have to think about the long term welfare of these children and act accordingly," explains Namrata Bhandari at the Central Child Welfare Board in Kathmandu.
Bringing them back

Since it was set up in September 2016, Chirag Chori Nepal has repatriated over 50 Nepali children from shelters in Delhi and Bengaluru. This year alone, it has taken back 17 boys from four children’s homes based in Delhi to Kathmandu.

With the children brought home, the boys aged 8-17 were first taken to Chirag Chori Nepal’s temporary shelter in Kathmandu’s Gabalsari area. Chirag Chori Nepal has one shelter in Katmandu. It first tries to trace the families of the children and help reunite them. In cases where the familial environment is deemed unsafe for the child, Chirag Chori Nepal places the child in a long-term care home and provides for their education.

“The majority of these children are runaways who end up getting caught and are sent to live in children’s homes. Once inside very few are able to contact their families and return,” says co-director Artha Khaka who works with partner Shaluja CM to find the children and facilitate the reunification process.

However, with the number of Nepali children living in government shelters in India now running into the thousands, one might question the impact of works done by organisations like Chirag Chori which can only bring a limited number of children home. “We know that the problem is huge but if we just sit back and do nothing, more and more Nepali children will end up lost in Indian homes,” says Shaluja.

Most of the 17 children (pic, above) who were brought back this week had run away from their homes, were trafficked, and are now back home in Kathmandu.

COMING HOME: Chira Chori Nepal is known for its work in reunifying children brought back to Nepal. This week, they brought back 17 boys from four children’s homes based in Delhi to Kathmandu.

REUNITED

Mimasa Sunar (pic, above) was overjoyed as she hugged her sons Mahendra and Shishir, who had run away from home in January. She had no idea when she would see her sons again.

“My husband and I are very grateful,” says Sunar, wiping her tears. The brothers were among the 17 children brought back from Delhi this week by an organisation working to repatriate Nepali children stuck in shelters in India.

Mahendra and Shishir were only looking for a few days of adventure in a foreign land. “I thought I’d never find them,” said Sunar, wiping her tears. Once the boys were reunited, they headed straight to their parents’ homes in Kathmandu, where they were celebrated with a festival.

When questioned about his family and hometown, all Ravi Kumar (left) will say is “I don’t remember” in Hindi. The 15-year-old is one of the boys brought back from the DHRF shelter for boys in New Delhi.

“I don’t want to go home,” says Kumar. The boys are all from Nepal and have been raised in India. They speak Nepali and want to return to Nepal. They have been here for four years and are enrolled in Grade 7.

Kalu, a 17-year-old boy from Patna, is happy to have returned to his hometown. “I feel at home,” he says. He wants to become a lawyer. He is happy to be back in Nepal.

Kalu wants to learn to use a computer, get trained as an electrician or plumber at the shelter and use that to make himself a living when he gets out.

And the rest of the news that didn’t fit

It has been our experience in the business that important international happenings like Kim Kardashian’s selfie, Holly Hagan’s breast augmentation and Miss Selma Gomez taking out an insurance policy on her billybutton often crowd out equally earth-shattering events here at home. And even as Nepal’s vibration-free press tries to accommodate all the gossip that fits to print there is, understandably, a lack of space and many news items of vital national importance go into the rubbish bin. That is why it is incumbent upon us as media tycoons dedicated to the public’s right to say “no”, to bring our valued customers up to speed on goings-on in this great country of ours without fear or favourism. This rundown of weekly news is brought to you by 5 Virginian Commies (‘mother Because She Would Be Overdoing It’) and NASA Engineering College (‘We shoot the Stars’).

Prince Hari To Stay in Nepal Forever

Impressed by the great progress Nepal has made in preserving earthquake-themed in as-was-his-condition and in conserving the country’s medieval way of life, Britain’s Prince Hari has decided not to return to the UK. The Prince (currently third in line to the British throne) announced this through his Twitter account and said it was a spur of the moment decision to renounce his British citizenship and become a naturalised Nepali even if it takes 13 years of residence.

Nepal’s constitution exporters said that if the monarchy was reinstated in Nepal, in future, there would be no legal problem to fast track the prince’s candidacy to be King Hari III.

Nepal Celebrates Earth Hours

While cities around the world turned off their lights for 60 minutes during Earth Hour this week, Nepal put the rest of the world to shame by turning off its electricity supply for 14 hours. “We wanted to show our commitment to reduce our carbon footprint and to spread awareness about global warming,” said the Minister of Load Shedding and Hot Air, reading his communiqué by candlelight.

He added that Nepal had reduced its diesel imports to almost zero in the second half of 2015, and credited the Indian blockade for helping Nepal attain its goal of being a zero carbon economy.

Nepal Included In Two More Listicles

Nepal this week was included in two more internet listicles, showing that the efforts by the National Tourism Board to publicise Nepal is bearing fruit. A hitherto unheard of portal in Serbia-Herzegovina has decided that Kathmandu has the third worst air quality among the world’s cities. Alarmed by this, the government is taking stern action and the Nepal Embassy in Geneva has filed a strongly-worded note verbal asking the Serbs to clarify in writing how they came up with the list, and how come Kathmandu did not make it to the bottom of the heap as the city with the worst air quality.

The Government spokesmen said: “We suspect foul play. The two cities on the list that beat Kathmandu, Tetero in Manchuria and Cairo in Egypt, must have done some fixing.” Meanwhile Trip Advisor has ranked Nepal 23rd on a list of 25 top travel destinations in the world and used algorithms in a sentiment analysis of visitor comments. For example feedback like “Kathmandu Airport, there is no other airport like it in the world” is counted as a positive comment. So be ‘Visit Nepal and go back to the dark ages’ or ‘Wait 3 Hours for Baggage at Kathmandu Airport, Get Free Haircut’.

FinMin To Tax Smuggling

In an effort to increase internal revenue that has fallen drastically after the Blockade, the Finance Ministry has announced it will start taxing smugglers and their illicit income. The measure is expected to add 3 Khurans 45 Arabs and 77 Corodes to the government coffers every month.

The Ministry’s new initiative that has the slogan ‘No Representation Without Taxation’ will start at the Biratnagar Dry Port and then to petrol stations and gas depots throughout the country.

However the Federation of Nepalese Blackmarketers in a statement denounced the move and threatened to bring all smuggling to a halt, thus crippling the national economy. Micro-bus syndicates expressed solidarity with the action, and said it would vandalise all buses that dared to ply on the Ring Road in defiance of its right to a monopoly on public transport.

Yeti Exists: Expedition

A group of Nepali primatologists said today they had found indubitable proof that the yeti (indeed exists). After three years extensively scouring the worldwide web through several search engines, the scientists said they had found at least 31,000 records of yeti on Google alone and at least 25 Facebook pages of Yeti. “When we did an image search, we found visual proof of 6,000 yeti,” scientists said. “It is a myth that the yeti does not exist.” Several yeti approached for comment via WhatsApp to confirm or deny their existence answered: “Maybe.”
