This project was completed under the aegis of the Southern Asian Institute of Columbia University, and we wish to express our gratitude to Ainslie T. Embree, Director, and William F. Fisher, Assistant Director for their forbearance and cooperation in this endeavour. David Lelyveld, Review Editor of the Journal of Asian Studies, provided us with timely news of new publications and a unique opportunity to examine them.

The reference librarians of Columbia University were of immeasureable assistance, both in the early stages when we were designing a data base system and later in the continuing process of uncovering valuable reference resources. We especially thank Eileen McIlvaine, Lora Benkowsky and Anita Lowry for the extra interest and care they took in helping us formulate our data base requirements and in ferreting out obscure works.

The exacting and tedious task of entering the citations into the data base was done by several people and they deserve special recognition for their stamina. We thank Anne Heimstra and Anjaly Banshali for their efforts in this regard. The bulk of this onerous task was accomplished with good humor and blinding speed by Claire Riccardi, without whom it is impossible to imagine this project ever having reached a satisfactory conclusion.
INTRODUCTION

The present bibliography contains some 7,000 entries on the history and social sciences of the peoples of the Himalayas. The variety and relative isolation of the Himalayan cultures has brought many scholars to that part of the world in recent years. The most active areas of research have been anthropology, religion, language, art, and history, though the latter has been somewhat neglected.

Almost all earlier bibliographies have been specific to a particular area or subject. This one is a first attempt at covering the entire Indus-Brahmaputra region. It is multi-disciplinary, but its focus is on humanity in the Himalayas. Hence, it in general excludes subjects in the natural sciences such as geology, biology, and botany, but includes them if they are directly relevant to human life and society.

The geographical boundaries are the same as those used in the previous works done at Columbia University: The Himalayas: Essays and Readings in the History and Anthropology and the two syllabi, A Syllabus of Himalayan Anthropology and A Syllabus of Himalayan History. The concept of the Himalayan region articulated here is this broad international one: from west to east the Indus-Brahmaputra region, and south to north the political borders formed by Pakistan, India, Nepal, Bhutan, China, and Burma. But a broad definition such as this one cannot remain rigid, and the authors have included relevant research that falls beyond the borders so defined. This is particularly true of important works on Tibet and India that are crucial to understanding one or more of the Himalayan cultures.

Originally conceived in terms of history and anthropology, the bibliography includes much more; the user will find the humanities broadly covered: not only does the work cover history, but it includes also language, literature, and art. Not only anthropology, but geography, demography, ethnography, religion, and related social science disciplines are also included.

The work is primarily a guide to the scholarly scientific literature and popular works on topics where little scientific research has been done. Newspapers or magazine articles have not been included except where they involved substantial historical or social analysis or provided important information thought to be unavailable elsewhere. Historical documents as such have not been included except where historical analysis is also present.

The languages covered are western, primarily English, French, German, and Italian, with items in several Scandanavian and Slavic languages as well. It is hoped that future editions will include titles in Japanese and Chinese.

The truly massive undertaking of including the literature in the many native languages, primarily Kashmiri, Hindi, Urdu, Nepali, Newari, Tibetan, and the other Himalayan languages, has not been attempted here. Such an undertaking, while it would be of immense value, could only be done in conjunction with the main centers of learning in the Himalayas and such international organizations as ICIMOD in Kathmandu.

The one area that has not been covered systematically here is the voluminous literature on economic development. This literature has been included in so far as it pertains directly to the scope of this project and is relatively easy of access. Major works that assess the potential for development or the effects of development on traditional modes of life have been cited here: those works which stress the more technical or bureaucratic aspects of development have not. Much of the most current literature on development is available only in the form of in-house reports. It is hoped that future editions of this work will include more of this literature. Again, to be truly comprehensive, this would require the cooperation of the most active agencies in the field and the various governments. The addition of this material, together with that in the Himalayan languages, would create a research tool of immense scientific and practical value, of which the present data base is the first step.

The organization of this bibliography is based on very broadly defined disciplinary fields that are in themselves interdisciplinary. The section labelled "History" also encompasses archaeology and works of literature that are relevant to the criteria specified above. The next section, entitled "Anthropology and Related Social Sciences", includes demography, sociology, religious studies, geography, ecology, folklore studies, and economics. The third section, labelled "Art and Architecture", also includes iconographical studies, descriptions of contemporary material culture, and art history. The fourth section, entitled "Development", has been adequately described above. This is followed by the "Language" section which includes linguistics, language training materials, vocabularies, and dictionaries. The "Travel Accounts" section includes only those travelogues which provide useful cultural or historical information. Mountaineering accounts have not been included unless they are of particular historical import or include significant information on the area in which the expedition occurred. Finally, a bibliography of bibliographies provides access to areas of interest outside the scope of this work.

The subdivisions within these disciplines vary in accordance with the amount of material they encompass. For example, the material on Sikkim is sufficiently extensive to warrant a separate subsection under the History section but not under the Art section, where Sikkim is combined with material on other states in the North-Central and Eastern Indian Himalayan Region. With the exception of the Development Section, Kashmir has been treated in a separate sub-section throughout due to the richness of material on this area and the extensive literature written prior to Partition.

All entries are followed by a series of "Key Words" used in the creation of the data base from which this edition was created. They have been included here for their informational value, for their purpose is to supplement information provided by the title of the work they describe. Some of them are internal reference codes used for sorting and indexing which serve little practical purpose for the reader, others are abbreviations of more useful descriptors. For these reasons a "Glossary of Key Words" is included for the reader's convenience.

Finally, a "Supplementary Index" is provided to complement the organization of material laid out in the table of contents. This index provides access to some of the key persons, places, and concepts which cross-cut the categories and sub-categories used to organize the bibliography. Ethnic groups have been listed under their various designations in those cases where several names apply, and cross-references have been included to refer to alternate names wherever appropriate. The index is by no means exhaustive; the fundamental intellectual task of reference research remains that of the investigator. It is hoped, however, that we have contributed to the intellectual aspects of this task by eliminating some of the more frustrating logistical obstacles which such a massive and varied corpus presents.
